INTRODUCTION

This volume of the National Library of Medicine Audiovisuals Catalog is a cumulation of citations to audiovisual materials cataloged by NLM or revised during the year. Included are cataloging records from the first three quarters of the year, originally published in the quarterly issues of the NLM Audiovisuals Catalog.

Audiovisual materials listed in the NLM Audiovisuals Catalog are available from the distributor cited in the entry.

Bibliographic references in the NLM Audiovisuals Catalog may in some cases be augmented by evaluative information describing the appropriate health science audience, educational levels, specialties and learning methods. Until March 1982, this assessment data was gathered through a critical appraisal process conducted under the auspices of the Assocation of American Medical Colleges (AAMC). On other records, the information has been supplied either by the reviewing organization listed in the citation or by the producer of the title. Citations augmented by critical review data or descriptive producer-supplied information include abstracts.

Citations for these materials, in addition to being published in the NLM Audiovisuals Catalog, are available through a computerized online data file known as AVLINE (Audiovisuals Online). AVLINE is available for search and retrieval at over 1900 institutions in the U.S. that belong to NLM's online network.[1]

Users interested in citations to audiovisuals cataloged prior to 1975 will find them in the NLM Current Catalog. In 1977, the Library published a separate volume entitled AVLINE Catalog covering items cataloged in 1975 and 1976. For 1977, citations to audiovisuals cataloged by NLM were announced in the quarterly NLM Current Catalog and then cumulated for the year in the NLM Audiovisuals Catalog, Annual Cumulation, 1977. Since 1978, NLM no longer includes audiovisual materials in the NLM Current Catalog unless they are serial titles which are covered in both publications.[2]

Format of the Catalog

The NLM Audiovisuals Catalog is arranged in the following sections:

(a) Monographs Name and Title Section;

(b) Serials Name and Title Section;

(c) Monographs Subject Section;

(d) Serials Subject Section; and

(e) Procurement Section.

The Name and Title/Sections include full bibliographic information, including abstracts and review data, where applicable. Titles are listed alphabetically by the first significant word. Cross references are provided to the names of persons and/or institutions receiving credit for the production. Series access points are also provided through cross references.

Several types of abstracts are included in this section. Items appraised through full content review have critical reviews supplied in the AAMC review process or provided by participating professional societies; these are identified by the term "(Critical)." Items which are augmented by producer-supplied descriptive data contain the identifying term "(Producer)." Abstracts appearing without any parenthetical qualification were prepared by NLM as content summaries of the presentations.

Each record in the Name and Title Section identifies all known procurement sources and the price at time of cataloging. If more than one source is listed, the first listed price corresponds with the first listed source; the second price with the second source, etc. Order numbers, when available, are given in parentheses as the last element under "Price." If a piece is for loan and sale by the same organization, both the loan and sale information will appear under "Price"; this is followed by the source. If the price is unknown or complex, the phrase "Write for complete information" will appear under "Price."

Abstract:

(Critical) This program demonstrates mounting dental casts in a semi-adjustable articulator with immediate side shift, using clinically obtained facebow transfer, centric relation, and lateral bite registration records. Three main procedures are outlined: the clinical phase, the laboratory phase, and the individual procedure. The narration is redundant and poorly organized. Common pitfalls are featured, but not all the explanations are complete or well rationalized. Minor errors in instrumentation and procedure identification are noted. An extremely hazardous technique of melting wax over a reclining patient with a cigarette lighter is depicted. The audience level is ambiguous: it is not well sequenced for the clinician, and although it is not specified, additional instruction and fundamental knowledge are necessary for full comprehension. The presentation is very long and could easily be condensed or divided into three units.

The program is recommended with reservations for use.

In the Subject Sections, audiovisuals are listed under terms selected from the Library's Medical Subject Headings (MeSH).[1] Broad subject categories (anatomy, dentistry, pediatrics, etc.) are not used unless the audiovisual is concerned with the field as a health occupation or discipline. For example, titles relating to the anatomy of the lung, heart, or liver are listed alphabetically under those specific terms and not under the general category of anatomy.

The example from the Name and Title Section given would appear in the Subject Section thus:

NOTES FOR CATALOGERS

Descriptive Cataloging

The authority for establishing personal and corporate entries is the Anglo-American Cataloguing Rules (Second Edition, 1978) with later changes from the Library of Congress Cataloging Service Bulletin.

Other descriptive cataloging for new items cataloged after December 31, 1980, also follows the provisions of the Anglo-American Cataloguing Rules (Second Edition, 1978). Older records cataloged under prior rules but appearing in this publication may be identified by the citation number located at the bottom of the entry. The first two digits of the citation number indicate the cataloging year.

Explanations of NLM's interpretation and application of cataloging rules are given in the publication Notes for Medical Catalogers which is issued by the Library's Cataloging Section as a section of the quarterly issues of NLM Current Catalog.[2]

Classification

Medical titles are classified according to the National Library of Medicine Classification [2] (Fourth Edition, 1978, revised 1981). For titles in fields peripheral to medicine, Library of Congress classification schedules are used in full, with no modification.

Various substitutes for traditional call numbers appear throughout this publication. The 04NLM number shows that the piece is held in the collection at NLM under that call number. The OXNLM number is used to identify titles that are not shelved in the main collection at NLM or that are not shelved at NLM by that call number. It is assigned to aid libraries that need classification information.

While shelflisting for audiovisual serials follows standard NLM procedures for cuttering as described in the National Library of Medicine Classification [2], all monographic titles are shelflisted using a two-letter code that indicates the medium of the physical item NLM owns. The medium code in the call number for the monographic item may be different from the General Material Designation appearing in brackets after the title; the latter indicates the format available for sale or loan. The portion of the shelflist number after the two-letter medium code is an NLM accession number. As an example, referring to the citations printed earlier in this publication, the two-letter code "VC" stands for videocassette. For a complete list of the media codes used in shelflisting audiovisuals at NLM, see the AVLINE chapter of the NLM Online Services Reference Manual. [1]

Subject Headings

The subject headings used throughout this catalog are from Medical Subject Headings (MeSH) [2], NLM's controlled vocabulary used in the preparation of Index Medicus as well as for subject cataloging in the NLM Current Catalog. [2]

Errors

Users of the NLM Audiovisuals Catalog are invited to send suggestions or refer any errors they find to the attention of:

04NLM: WB 205 VC no.11 7 1982
Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a visual guide to physical examination, integrates graphic sequences with examination to illustrate the areas of the abdominal cavity. All major organs and structures are shown sequentially, emphasizing their relationship to one another and to landmarks for examination by palpation, percussion, and auscultation. Division of the abdomen into quadrants and the location of the epigastric area are shown.

04NLM: WP 458 VC no.5 1977
Abstract: (Critical) This program shows the procedures for dilation, curettage, abdominal hysterectomy, and sigmoid resection in a 60 year old patient with cancer of endometrium and metastases to sigmoid colon. The surgical management described the entire procedure for the anastomosis of the bowel. The presentation is well done, although the cinematography is difficult to follow because of poor camera angles. Despite this difficulty, the program is recommended for gynecology students and practitioners.

1. Intestinal Absorption - motion pictures I. Binder, Henry Joseph, 1936- II. Eaton Laboratories

04NLM: WI 102 VC no.2 1973
Abstract: This program illustrates by means of animation the mechanism, processes and sites of intestinal digestion and absorption of the major nutrients. The program first introduces the absorption surfaces of the small intestine, namely, the valvulae conniventes, villi, and micro-villi. The three absorption processes, diffusion, active transport, and solvent drag which occur within the intestinal wall are then described diagrammatically. The mechanism and transport rate in relation to the absorption rate of the nutrients in each process are described at length. The competitive inhibition and saturation kinetics that are characteristic of the active transport in addition to the in vitro study of this process by means of the everted gut sac technique are presented in detail. The coupled movement (i.e., active transport and solvent drag) as it occurs during the solvent drag process is also mentioned. Absorption of the nutrients is observed to be localized in segments of the small intestine. The sites and the conditions favorable for absorption of water, sodium, glucose, carbohydrate, protein and B12 are then presented.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a series on the neurologically disabled patient, discusses mobility as a human phenomenon that enables the disabled person to perform the activities he desires. Mobility activities of physical upgrading, walking, transfer, and use of a wheelchair, walker, and cane are depicted. The importance of range of motion for maintaining mobility and preventing joint contractures and deformity is stressed. Components of each technique are clearly visible and are demonstrated in sufficient detail. Characteristic differences in mobility of right and left hemiplegic patients are described. This clear, well designed program is highly recommended for baccalaureate nursing students and staff nurses.

Abstract: (Producer) This program is a demonstration and explanation of experiments using acupuncture analgesia instead of local anesthetics for drilling teeth. A historical summary of acupuncture, an introduction to the research, and an outline of the procedure of the first experiment, and four variations of basic experimental design are presented. A panel, made up of four researchers, discusses the experiments. The operational procedure and pre- and post-treatment interviews with the volunteers are included.

Abstract: (Critical) In two case studies of gastrointestinal bleeding, this program reviews the assessment of patients' clinical status. Diagnosis, therapeutic assistance, radiology, endoscopy, surgery, and angiography are among the topics discussed. The case presentations limit the scope of the discussion to consideration of a duodenal ulcer and lower GI bleeding from diverticular disease of the colon. Alternatives to conventional techniques are considered, but an inordinant amount of time is spent discussing such controverial issues as the role of upper GI endoscopy in UGI bleeding and new improved modalities of treatment. Management of bleeding esophageal varicies is not discussed. In the case presentation format, this omits several aspects of the problem, but as a formal lecture, this program is recommended for medical students, housestaff, and family practitioners.

04NLM: WJ 300 SL no.1 1971
Abstract: This program presents a review of acute renal failure with emphasis on its diagnosis and treatment. Slides of graphs, histologic sections, gross specimens, and radiographs of the kidney are discussed in the accompanying text. A brief introduction discusses the high morbidity and mortality rates associated with acute renal failure, thus underscoring the importance of early prevention and treatment. The five major causes of acute renal failure are then discussed. These five major causes are subclassified as follows: 1. Acute tubular necrosis, characterized by distinct causative features, is divided into three groups: Group A, peripheral circulatory failure; Group B, pigment excretion; Group C, toxic neuropathy. 2. The vascular causes are arterial, venous, capillaries (glomeruli) and functional vascular narrowing. 3. The infectious causes include gram-negative infections, candidiasis and septicemia. 4. The hypersensitivity diseases which cause acute renal failure include: glomerulonephritis, periarteritis, serum sickness and drug sensitivity. 5. Obstructive uropathy caused by inadequate lumen, intrinsic blockade or extrinsic compression is the fifth cause. The physiopathological features of each of the five major causes are then described. The course of acute renal failure as observed by various clinical and laboratory findings is then outlined. The treatment of the disease by treating the underlying cause, regulating diet and fluid intake, and employing peritoneal dialysis, hemodialysis and homotransplantation is described.

04NLM: WU 270 VC no.1 1976
Abstract: This presentation describes and demonstrates a program designed and being carried out by the National Institute of Dental Research using adhesive sealants for the prevention of dental caries. This objective is achieved with the aid of clinical subjects, dental personnel, graphs, electron micrographs, animation, drawings, and diagrams. In this presentation the production of dental caries by bacteria is described. Graphs are then presented to illustrate the effects of various methods of fluoridation upon occlusal caries. The reasons for the occlusal surfaces of the posterior teeth to be particularly prone to dental caries are described and demonstrated. The anatomy of the tooth is reviewed in relationship to the pits and fissures and dental caries. Methods such as prophylactic odontotomy and rounding out the grooves to decrease dental caries are also discussed. The technique of etching the posterior occlusal surfaces using a solution of 30-50% phosphoric acid then washing thoroughly and applying an adhesive sealant to the pits and fissures is then demonstrated step-by-step on a small child. The types of personnel required to perform this technique and the retention rates are then discussed in detail. The advantages of this program are then cited.

Abstract: This program demonstrates the administration of medication by Z-track injection. At first two simulations show the difference between direct and Z-track injections and their influence on tracking of injection fluid. Secondly, the following steps are demonstrated: checking of patient medication order and medication, identification of the site for an intramuscular injection (dorsal gluteal), cleansing of skin, retraction of skin and insertion of needle, withdrawal followed by injection and withdrawal of needle. Finally skin fold is released.

04NLM: WP 870 VC no.2.4 1966

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and demonstrate the treatment of advanced disease in carcinoma of the breast including endocrine management and adrenalectomy. According to this program, the palliation of recurrence is considered to be most effectively done with endocrine management using radiotherapy and chemotherapy as important aids in the process. The effects of four steroid hormones are explored. These hormones include estrogen, progesterone, testosterone and cortisol. For early current metastatic disease oophorectomy followed by adrenalectomy is considered to be the most effective in obtaining remission. Statistics are presented to compare and contrast the effectiveness of adrenalectomy and hypophysectomy. In this presentation a bilateral adrenalectomy is performed on a 48 year old female patient. Her previous history and current findings are presented. With the patient in the prone position and legs lowered and the lumbar spine straight, a curved incision is made along the lateral border of the sacrospinalis muscle along the 12th rib. The 12th rib is resected and the crus of the diaphragm is divided. The renal fossa is entered, the adrenal gland is mobilized and removed approximately 5 mm. from the vena cava. The crus of the diaphragm is sutured, the fascia is closed over the renal fossa and the wound is closed in layers. This procedure is then performed on the opposite side. The postoperative care including the administration of hydrocortisone is discussed. The selection of patients for surgery is also discussed. Chemical measurements used to aid in evaluating patient for surgery are then discussed including the urine calcium excretion, BH discriminant, and the urinary 17 ketosteroid excretion tests.

Abstract: (Producer) This module is a comprehensive overview of the effects of alcohol on the liver. Epidemiological evidence establishing alcohol as a major cause of liver injury and cirrhosis is summarized. The pathogenesis, pathology, course, management, complications, and prognosis of various entities are described. The influence of mitochondria re-oxidation of NADH in limiting the rate of hepatic oxidation of ethanol is detailed. The clinical manifestations and management of metabolic defects leading to fatty liver are illustrated. Consequences of excess ethanol ingestion of glucose, lactate, and ketone metabolism and hepatic drug metabolism are reviewed. This program is intended for physicians, nurses, biochemists, pharmacologists, and health science students.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents the basic anatomical terminology used to describe basic positions and directions in reference to the human body. The sagittal, coronal and transverse planes of the trunk, limbs, and organs as well as the resulting body portions are all briefly explained. Although the program is quite short and includes only those terms of static position, it includes very good practice exercises and examples to illustrate each term. This material has broad usefulness not only to students beginning in the health sciences but also to those in secretarial positions in the health sciences.

04NLM: WU 101.3 VC no.1 1978
Abstract: (Producer) This program presents the basic structure of the adult tooth as a preparation for engaging in a more detailed structural study and for studying odontogenesis. The demonstration uses decalcified and calcified sections. This anatomical review includes such structures as the crown and root, enamel, dentin, and the odontoblasts and their respective odontoblastic canals. Further identified structures are a Tomes granular layer, radicular dentin, the coronal and the radicular parts of the pulp. The periodontal ligament and its relationship to the cementum and alveolar bone is shown. Finally, features of the gingiva are reviewed.

Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates techniques for film or video animation using 2 x 2 slides and overhead projectors. Combination 2 x 2 and overhead, overhead with a 'crawl' attachment, and multiple 2 x 2 projectors are among the approaches presented. This does not show or describe how the slides or overhead transperancies were produced; it does not explain how the slides or overhead transperancies were produced; it does not explain how to create similar animation effects. The material is useful in depicting manipulation with still projectors for media production unity without sophisticated video and film animation equipment such as special effects generators. This is recommended to health science faculty, photographers, illustrators, and TV producers who are working with modest equipment to produce visual learning material.

Abstract: (Critical) This program admirably fulfills its objective of explaining the principles of anti-globulin procedures, comparing direct and indirect procedures, and explaining false negative and positive reactions. The use of split screen technique showing actual blood slides and schematic representations of antibody reactions is an excellent aid to learning. The overall presentation is excellent in content, educational process, and technical aspects. There is a slightly bothersome fluctuation in level of narration and in beep tone. The first portion of the program is equally useful for medical students or medical technology students; the last portion is more directly applicable to students of medical technology. The program also provides a useful review for purposes of continuing education.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate symptom formation due to anxiety primarily by means of a case study. The program, narrated by Dr. David Forrest, includes a medical history of the patient, progressive interview segments and typical anxiety symptoms including those expressed in the patient. In addition, the long range treatment goals for this patient are given. The patient shown in this presentation is a forty-two year old female with an organic cavitation of the cervical cord. Her condition is accompanied by anxiety expressed by symptoms and symbolic elaboration of her physical impairment. During the segments of interviews the patient describes her use of symptoms as a vehicle to reach and please her doctors. She also discusses her fantasies about dying, her present social relationships and her childhood history which included a fear of her father and maternal deprivation. The program describes the patient's anxiety symptoms and such other typical anxiety symptoms as agoraphobia, hyperventilation, la belle indifference, hysterical conversion and somatic compliance. In the last interview segment, the patient speaks of her feelings about being videotaped and mentions that she enjoys the attention. As a conclusion, the program notes that the patient underwent corrective surgery for the implantation of a valve to drain the cervical cavity. Additional psychoanalytically oriented psychotherapy results in her being able to meet the problem of emotional security in a more adult manner.

Abstract: (Critical) This unit, volume 18 of a cardiology slide atlas, presents the pathophysiological correlations on causes and consequences of aortic regurgitation. The production employs excellent pathological specimens and echocardiograms for illustration purposes; but the omission of carotid pulse tracings, phonocardiograms, or apexcardiograms is a significant weakness. Worthwhile material overall, this item is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a slide atlas of cardiology presents the pathologic, radiologic, echocardiographic and electrocardiographic findings of aortic stenosis are compared. The information is concise, accurate and current, and the production's organization is flexible, although somewhat confusing without an outline. Basic pathologic findings and effects on the left ventricle are emphasized, but pathophysiology, including hemodynamic findings is not presented. Diagrammatic representation of the slides accompany the text. This program is recommended as an introduction to aortic stenosis for the medical student.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents a definition, purpose, indications and procedure of arterial line calibration. The demonstration is specific to one, now outdated, instrument style. Rationale behind procedural steps is not provided and the actual calibration is not clearly illustrated, so the viewer is not prepared for any variation in responses from those depicted. The arterial line is shadowed to indicate the portion under discussion; however, the views of the unit, equipment and readout lack clarity. Because the program does not contain adequate detail, it is recommended with reservations for the student nurses with some knowledge of arterial line.

04NLM: WE 300 ST no.1 1971

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to discuss arthrology, the sum of what is known about the joints.

This program includes in its discussion both temporary and permanent joints. In addition, the program describes the location, function and structure of the following types of joints, fibrous, cartilaginous, and synovial. Also included are descriptions of the bursa and the movements of the synovial joints, i.e., gliding and angular, rotatory and circumduction. Next, the types of synovial joints, the uniaxial, biaxial, polyaxial, and plane joints are described as are the mechanics and limitations to movements of the joints.

The program states that future study of specific joints should take into consideration the type, movement, specific and limiting factors. The program concludes with a review and a question and answer session on the interphalangeal joint.

Abstract: (Producer) This nine unit module is an overview of asepsis. An introduction discusses the purposes of medical and surgical asepsis and encourages the development of aseptic conscience. Sterilization and disinfection are differentiated, including physical and chemical methods of achievement. Rationale and correct procedure for basic and interim handwashing are presented. Handling sterile materials and equipment is detailed, donning, adjusting, and removing gloves are outlined; and surgical scrub, apparel, and preoperative skin preparation are discussed. Finally, the purpose, types, precautions, and basic methods relating to isolation are explained.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for nursing students, for nurses in refresher programs and for nurses in clinical practice who are updating their knowledge of emergency burn nursing. This program begins with a discussion of burn injuries and their impact upon the patient and family. The importance of emergency department care for the burn victim as a foundation for specialized care is emphasized. Factors which influence the severity of a burn injury are presented and explained. These include: extent of burn, depth of burn, age, past medical history, part of body injured and concurrent injury. The program explains why an accurate assessment of the severity factors forms the basis for the treatment of the burn victim. Methods for documenting the assessment are also presented.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents a wide range of concepts, classifications, definitions symptoms and diagnostic methods regarding the behavior and emotions of children. Definitions of 'normal' and 'abnormal' behaviors are included in Part 1. Part 2 discusses diagnoses and the concepts surrounding these such as psychosomatic, developmental and psychosocial. The presentation is quite lengthy and attempts to accomplish too much. Consequentially, much 'jargon' is used and labels are given but not explained. Also, little time is given to the applicability of this material to clinical medicine. Thus, the progrm is recommended only for limited use for psychiatrists.

Abstract: (Producer) This program presents first the pathogenesis of atherosclerosis in general at the microscopic and macroscopic levels. The various pathogenetic factors are discussed including age, sex, hypertension, diabetes mellitus, heredity, smoking, plasma lipids and personality type. A pathogenetic scheme is presented summarizing the events leading to the full blown lesion. Second, the program presents the symptomatology and clinical course of events and the underlying histopathological phenomena, and the complications of myocardial infarction. The clinical and laboratory diagnosis of the disease is reviewed.

04NLM: WG 220 VC no.2 1975
Abstract: This presentation describes and demonstrates step-by-step a surgical correction of an atrial septal defect on an eight year old male. The normal circulation through the heart is described and demonstrated diagrammatically and the physiopathology of an atrial septal defect is discussed.

During surgery a classical secundum type defect is demonstrated in the midportion of the septum. It is closed with a simple running suture beginning with a pursestring suture at the inferior aspect of the defect. Separate fenestrations in the septum primum are closed with figure of eight sutures. Air and blood are aspirated from the left ventricle and aorta with a large bore needle and syringe. The atriotomy is then closed. As blood is allowed to fill the right atrium the pursestring suture is released to remove air from the right side of the heart. The tricuspid valve is made incompetent and the lungs are again inflated to force air out of the right heart. The aorta is aspirated and the snare is released on the aorta. The coronary arteries are perfused and the apex of the heart is elevated to aspirate air from the left ventricle. The needle holes are closed with figure of eight stitches. The patient is taken off bypass and the wound is closed. Normal and abnormal indicator dilution dye curves are compared and contrasted.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents decompensation and end-diastolic volume in heart control. The roles of renin, aldosterone and antidiuretic hormones in controlling blood volume are discussed as well as the control of cardiac stroke volume. The presentation contains some inconsistencies, and outdated material. Thus, the presentation is recommended with reservations for physiologists and cardiologists.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is a concise, accurate description of techniques for the rapid identification of yeasts in clinical diagnostic laboratories. Two procedures to expidite identification are demonstrated and explained in detail. Media, suspension, appearance, and incubation periods are reviewed. The visuals are good and the narration is clear, and the format is well organized. Although the presentation may be slightly rapid for the novice, it is excellent for the experienced technician. The program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This two part module examines the circulatory system to illustrate what blood pressure is, how it originates, and what happens inside the blood vessels during systole and diastole. The intricate design and functional construction of the arteries and arterioles is depicted through explicit artwork. How the vessels work to maintain blood pressure within a normal range, and how they react to accommodate both high and low abnormal ranges is demonstrated. Factors which affect blood pressure, such as elasticity, cardiac output, blood volume, viscosity, and perpheral resistance are defined, described, and illustrated. The program contains preview and review exercises as part of the instructor's guide.

Abstract: This program utilizes drawings to discuss basic design and terminology related to the central nervous system. Initially, the two main components of the nervous system, the central nervous system and the peripheral nervous system are defined. The basic design of the central nervous system is then identified. The central nervous system is considered to consist of a group of interconnected cavities called ventricles, surrounded by gray and white matter. Terminology of use in identifying the components of both the gray and white matter are then discussed. The terms tract, pathway, commissure and decussation, ligamentum axis, anterior-posterior, transverse section, frontal, horizontal, and saggital sections are also defined. The six major regions of the central nervous system, the telencephalon, diencephalon, mesencephalon, metencephalon, myeloencephalon, and spinal medulla are discussed. These structures are then identified on a drawing.

04NLM: WB 289 VC no.3 1979
Abstract: (Critical) This program is an introduction to diagnostic ultrasound, covering the history of the development and the underlying principles. Construction of a transducer probe, methods of production of the diagnostic ultrasound wave, and basic physics of wave motion, behavior of waves at boundaries, attentuation of an ultrasound wave, and the piezoelectric affect are illustrated. A-mode, B-mode, and Real Time Ultrasound are differentiated. The material is technically excellent and the format is well organized. Inclusion of discussion of clinical material and physical factors and a final summary would enhance the educational impact. The program is suitable for ultrasound technicians in training with a knowledge of basic physics, for continuing education of ultrasound technicians, for diagnostic radiologists undergoing basic training in diagnostic ultrasound or for continuing education purposes, and it is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: This program describes and demonstrates step-by-step the Bassett operation for squamous cell carcinoma of the vulva. The procedure is demonstrated on two different cases. A third case is presented to illustrate the postoperative results. The Basset operation, shown here, involves a one stage en bloc dissection, and consists of multiple steps. These steps include dissection of the anterior abdominal wall, bilateral dissection of the superficial nodes, bilateral saphenous dissection, bilateral hernia repair, and bilateral dissection of the external iliac and obturator nodes. The primary incision is made over the symphysis pubis. The first case shown is a patient with a primary epithelioma of the vulva. Repair work in this case is more extensive than that done in the second case.

04NLM: W 85 VC no.1 1978
Abstract: (Critical) This program presents an introduction to patient education for primary care physicians and other health care personnel, emphasizing the importance of patient education, the physician's responsibility in the process, the feasibility of patient education and the benefits incurred by patient and physician of patient education. Four booklets are included in the package: (1) Faculty Guide, (2) Resident's Self-Study Guide, (3) Guide to Possible Follow-up Activities, and (4) Needs Assessment Questionnaire. The videocassette illustrated both good doctor-patient interaction in patient education, and informal discussions of the subject among physicians.
This entire package provides an excellent means of introducing patient education as an integral part of primary care, stimulating those involved in patient education to develop, and teach skills needed in patient education. This program is primarily designed for primary care residency training programs. It is highly recommended.

Abstract: (Producer) This module reviews the characteristics of ethyl alcohol and other alcohols of medical or toxicological importance. U.S. consumption is considered and the alcoholic content of common beverages is reviewed. Ethanol dose-response relationships and their effects on the CNS are discussed as well as effects of ethanol on other organs exclusive of the liver. Uses and contraindications, absorptions, distribution, and metabolism of ethanol are explained. Disulfiram mechanisms of action and the effects of ethanol on hepatic microsomal enzymes are characterized. Tolerance, physical dependence, and acute poisoning with ethanol and other alcohols are discussed. The module includes graphs, charts, diagrams, and photographs; each slide is reproduced in a loose leaf text and each reprint is accompanied by a legend for discussion and a related bibliography. This material is appropriate for pharmacy, nursing, dental, graduate, and medical students.

Abstract: The purpose of this four part presentation is to describe and demonstrate the systematic treatment of carcinoma of the breast. The role of mammography and the epidemiology are also discussed. In this presentation a 45 year old female patient is presented in the operating room. Several types of incisions for biopsy are described. In this patient a circumareolar incision is made, the lesion is removed, opened and examined, and then sent for frozen section. The wound is closed with interrupted subcuticular sutures around the nipple. Photomicrographs are presented to demonstrate the presence of malignant cells in cystic disease. The use of needle biopsy is also discussed. In the second patient a needle biopsy is performed followed by an open biopsy. In this patient a submammary incision is made down to the plane between the breast tissue and the pectoralis fascia. The lesion is removed by sharp dissection, a small drain is placed, the incision is closed with interrupted sutures, and a pressure dressing is applied. In the third patient with a pendulous breast, a submammary incision is made, the lesion is removed, several interrupted catgut sutures are placed, the incision is closed, and a pressure dressing is applied. In the fourth case, a female patient in her sixties, a simple mastectomy is done as the biopsy. An Aguino incision is made, and the incision is extended around the breast, which is then removed.

Abstract: (Critical) This program reviews blood gases and electrolytes, including sodium and water balance, cellular metabolism, intracellular and extracellular fluids. Disturbances and alternations of components of normal body fluid, a spectrum of acid-base problems, and the numerical relationships of measurements and their interpretation are covered. Maintenance of isotonicity and of neutrality is outlined. The speaker is obviously very knowledgeable, but is sometimes difficult to understand and difficulties inherent to a taped lecture, which could be alleviated by visualization, are apparent. A certain amount of familiarity with the subject is necessary for full comprehension. The program is recommended with some reservation.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents clinical methods of measuring blood gases and electrolytes. Partial pressures of gas in plasma in equilibrium to the lung is discussed. Instrumentation, specimen collection and handling are detailed and the accuracy of blood gas measurement is emphasized. The basic principles of measuring electrolytes are well covered; however, the discussion should include ion specific electrodes in addition to flame photometer. A good discussion of pH meters is presented, but a better understanding of pCO2 measurements could be achieved by expansion of the pH relationship in the Henderson-Hasselbach equation. This program meets its objectives with no inaccuracies and is recommended for use.

1. Blood Grouping and Crossmatching - slides I. University of Missouri—Columbia. Medical Center. Educational Resources Group.
04NLM: QY 415 SC no.2 1978
Abstract: (Critical) This program is a discussion of blood group discrepancies. Recommendations are suggested for resolving discrepancies which occur from a variety of causes, and methods for typing a patient's blood compatibility with a donor are discussed. Typing problems are grouped into cell and serum problems. Blood group systems other than the ABO systems are considered. The material focuses on recognitions rather than resolution of ABO discrepancies. Although a key word list is provided, only basic terminology is defined, more specific terms are not. Elementary and advanced content is arbitrarily mixed; inconsistency in the depth of coverage and the lack of specified objectives lead to confusion regarding the intended audience. Several instances of misleading, incomplete, and inaccurate information are noted and outside reading may be necessary to understand and interpret the program. Aside from the poor labeling and some unclear symbols, the slides are innovative and the visual quality is excellent. This program is recommended for limited use.

04NLM: WL 300 SC no.2 1975

Abstract: (Critical) This program describes the arterial and venous blood supply of the central nervous system. The primary source of blood to the brain is clearly depicted, arising from the vertebral and internal carotid arteries. The distribution of these two major vessels to specific regions of the brain is accurately demonstrated. The sources of blood to the spinal cord, by way of the spinal segmental arteries, is clearly shown. Unfortunately, the venous drainage of the brain is not as clearly described, while that of the spinal cord is not discussed at all. While the technical quality of the program is generally excellent, the blood vessels are identified at much too rapid a pace. This makes them difficult to recognize. Due to this defect, this program is best used as a review for those who already have a background knowledge of the blood supply of the central nervous system.

04NLM: WY 150 VC no.17.6 1981

Abstract: (Producer) This three part module, part of a basic nursing series, reviews body mechanics, passive range of motion, and positioning the patient in bed. Base of support and center of gravity are discussed in reference to safe methods for lifting and moving. The value of practicing range of motion exercises are discussed and some techniques are demonstrated. Guidelines for frequently positioning the patient in bed are outlined. This self-instructional program is user paced and provides immediate feedback and reinforcement to the viewer.

04NLM: WM 420 VC no.13 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This program is an interview with Leopold Bellak, one of the first psychotherapists to use a calculated, short-term intervention. His use of psychodynamic conceptualizations to guide and facilitate 5-6 session treatment of the patient in crisis is portrayed. His therapy is based on insight particularly as it relates to the agreed upon goals and problems. Gathering a history, formulating an approach, setting goals, and contracting with the patient are outlined for the first interview. Management techniques for various common complaints are suggested. Other approaches to short-term psychotherapies are not considered, and the discussion omits the outcome or follow-up. A lack of specificity impairs the material's applicability. The delivery is distinct, despite some intrusive background noise and volume fluctuation. The program is recommended for use.

Abstract: This silent program features views of the equipment used in bronchofiberoscopy as well as excerpts of films taken with the bronchofiberoscope, which apparently lead to the establishment of the diagnosis of bronchogenic carcinoma. The technique for bronchofiberoscopy appears to be shown. Drawings are also used to aid in the visualization of the position and localization of lesions in both the right and left lung and bronchi. The summary presented at the end of the program concludes that bronchofiberoscopy is an important addition to bronchoscopic examination for the following reasons: the upper lobe range is greatly improved and brushing and biopsy can identify neoplasms. In addition, fiberoscopic guidance is useful in peripheral lesions.

04NLM: WL 300 SC no.5 1975
Abstract: (Critical) This six part module illustrates internal and external CNS morphology. Basic design and anatomical terminology are reviewed. The boundaries and features of the spinal cord, medulla, pons, midbrain, diencephalon, and telecephalon are described and nearly every major nucleus, tract, and gyrus are identified. The slides present clear and well labelled drawings and photographs. Gross and semi-microscopic study exercises are remarkably well integrated. The objectives of this highly organized introduction to neuroanatomy laboratory work are specifically stated. This program is highly recommended for use.

04NLM: WA 292 VC no.15 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This is a brief review of immediate cardiopulmonary resuscitation for the lay audience. The techniques of mouth-to-mouth breathing and external cardiac massage are described. Perhaps more attention to clearing the upper airway would have been in order in the program. Additionally, the massage demonstrated in the tape was demonstrated with interlocking fingers, a potential cause of sternal fracture. The importance of positioning the hands, a hard surface under the body, and the dangers of sternal and rib fractures all were underemphasized. With these cautionary notes in mind, the presentation can be recommended for use as support material in the teaching of CPR.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of an accredited series on introductory principles of nutrition, discusses controversial issues related to carbohydrates. The function and storage of carbohydrates is reviewed and the harmful effects of weight reducing regimens are considered. Chemical compositions, structural considerations, food sources, and functions are covered. A summary integrates the concepts under discussion.

Abstract: This program presents in the format of a self-assessment program the heart sounds and murmurs and additional relevant test findings of 15 patients. For each patient the heart sounds and murmurs are presented and at the same time other pertinent findings such as electrocardiogram, echocardiogram, and chest X-ray are presented. For each case some time is given for answering a diagnosis, followed by a greater in-depth discussion of the sounds and murmurs.

Abstract: (Producer) This program explains the relationship between pressure, flow and electrical events of the cardiac cycle based on recordings from a dog's heart. The student should be able to interpret pressure, flow and electrical recordings and to predict aberrations which could be expected in any of these events as a result of altered physiologic functions. A self-assessment program is included.

Abstract: (Critical) This unit, volume 21 of a slide atlas on cardiology, presents a concise review of the pathophysiological correlations of cardiomyopathy. With a few exceptions, the production displays superb integration of high quality media components. However, electrocardiogram slides are incomplete, an apexcardiogram would be a valuable addition, and the chest x-ray, although suggestive of cardiomyopathy, does not have good 'water bottle configuration.' The module is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This course on cardiovascular disease consisting of seven lectures and a question and answer session has the goal of providing pharmacists with practical, up-to-date information about these conditions. This includes an understanding of the cardiovascular system and its function, various diagnostic tests used to evaluate the cardio vascular system, and a discussion of the pathophysiology and treatment of cardiovascular diseases. Emphasis is given to drugs used in treatment and the pharmacology and side effects of these drugs. Specifically, the lectures deal with: (1) the cardiovascular system and diagnostic tests used, (2) physiology of heart failure, (3) myocardial infarction, (4) deep vein thrombophlebitis and pulmonary embolism, (5) cardiac arrhythmias, (6) coronary artery disease and angina pectoris and (7) hypertension and hypertensive crisis.

Abstract: (Producer) This program, part of the Ohio State University Series on Emergency Medicine, starts with a brief introduction to pericardial tamponade, defining the syndrome and elucidating its various clinical signs. Treatment modalities, both invasive and non-invasive, conclude this discussion. The section on pulmonary thromboembolism starts with a brief introduction, defining the various clinical concepts and signs. The portion devoted to diagnostic tests includes the use of the ECG, chest film, lung scan, angiogram and impedance plethysmogram and the evaluation of blood gases. Current recommended treatment of pulmonary thromboembolism, including the use of various oxygen delivery systems, heparin, urokinase (or streptokinase) and warfarin, concludes the program.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a series on emergency medicine, discusses shock. Various forms of shock are described and exemplified. An overview of assessment and management does not explain the technical aspects of procedures. For instance, a clear outline of Swan-Ganz cathether generated hemodynamic parameters is provided, but the actual insertion of the catheter and calculation of the various parameters is not covered. Knowledge of cardiovascular physiology, including concepts of preload, afterload, and contractility, are necessary for full comprehension. The material is logically presented and of good technical quality. It is recommended for medical students, critical care nurses, and practitioners.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, one in a visual guide to physical examination series, is a graphic sequence which delineates the internal and external jugular veins and the carotid arteries, with particular attention to landmarks for palpation and observation. Assessment of specific phenomena is demonstrated; areas of observation and differentiation are illustrated, and helpful maneuvers are suggested. Measurement techniques, timing, and auditory signals are presented. Focus is on the vessels of the neck and heart.

04NLM: WY 150 VC no.17 12 1981
Abstract: (Producer) This two part module, part of a basic nursing series, discusses the care and irrigation of the indwelling catheter. Correct techniques for keeping the catheter free of accumulated secretions and reducing the opportunity for development of urinary tract infection are demonstrated. Maintanence of catheter potency, aseptic techniques, and the prevention of trauma to the mucosa are discussed in relation to irrigation of the indwelling catheter. This self-instructional program offers immediate feedback as to the learner's progress. The rationale underlying these skills effectively reinforces the material.

04NLM: WU 270 MP16 no.1 1974

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and demonstrate the research efforts to develop a caries vaccine. This objective is achieved with the aid of drawings, photographs, clinical subjects, x-rays, histologic slides and views of gross specimens. In this presentation the prevalence of caries is discussed and efforts to provide a means to prevent caries are reviewed. Research efforts such as the fluoridation of drinking water, use of a fluoride gel, toothpaste, mouthwash and tablet, and an adhesive sealant to combat the microbial agent, increase the host resistance, and alter the dietary environment are described. The pathogenesis of dental caries is described and illustrated. The role of the salivary gland secretions in the prevention of caries is explored in detail. Research efforts currently being undertaken at the National Institute of Dental Health and at the State University of New York at Buffalo are described. The program then focuses on efforts to produce a vaccine product. The immunological aspects are explored and studies which have been carried out using such agents as Lactobacillus acidophilus and Streptococcus mutans are described.

Abstract: This program presents a review of the pharmacologic actions, side effects and nursing responsibilities for administering the central skeletal muscle relaxants and neuromuscular blocking agents. The indications for and uses of each group of these drugs are noted. The dosage and route of administration, of the following specific types of central skeletal muscle relaxants are discussed: carisprodol, methocarbamol, mephenesin, chlormezaonone, and diazepam. The specific neuromuscular blocking agents discussed include: tubocurarine chloride, dimethyl tubocurarine chloride, and gallamine triethiodide. The use of these types of drugs in Parkinson's disease is also discussed.

Abstract: (Critical) The subject area of this material is exceptionally important and now a leading cause of visual impairment in the United States. There is no question that members of the health care profession should be made more aware of the entity of subretinal neovascularization. This particular material does indicate the importance of the subject area but it is really geared more to the non-specialists perhaps medical students, nurses and ophthalmic technicians, rather than ophthalmologists except for those beginning their training.

Abstract: (Producer) This program explores kinds of change, emphasizing planned change — a systematic approach to a desired improvement of a desired change. A three step model for planned change is discussed. Two dramatic vignettes in a hospital setting are used to illustrate frequently seen responses to change. Suggestions on specific techniques for effecting planned change are presented, such as heightening the sense of mismatch between desirable and existing situations, consciousness raising, and change agentry.

Abstract: This program explains and illustrates, with slides depicting specific chest radiographs, clues which will aid the physical therapist in evaluating the patient's problems so that the appropriate treatment can be instituted. The use of the chest radiograph to evaluate the effects of such physical therapeutic measures as postural drainage is also briefly covered. Tools available to evaluate the patient's needs and to develop an appropriate treatment program are identified as follows: medical history, observations of the patient's respiration and cough, stethoscope, and external observations for deformities or faulty mechanics. The four densities found in the body, namely, air, fat, water, and bone in their effect on the images visualized in radiographs, in general, and more specifically on the chest radiograph are described. The features of the normal chest radiograph are then discussed in considerable detail. Specific radiographs are then presented to illustrate the following: pleural effusion, subpulmonic effusion, pneumonia, atelectasis, pulmonary edema, and extreme bullous emphysema.

Abstract: (Producer) This program presents episodes of child development from infancy through the age of six, in five parts. Part one shows in intimate detail the changes of infant and parent behavior in the first two months after delivery. Part two deals with the discoveries of infants from 2 to 14 months, their attempts to master basic skills such as eating, walking and communicating, and the development of distinct personalities. Acquisition of language and social skills and the concomitant interest in the environment are the landmarks of months 12 to 24 (part three). During the third and fourth years the child is growing toward independence and consciousness of being unique (part four). Part five (4 to 6 years) highlights the learning of additional skills that enable the child to succeed in the adult world. Parts one and three of this program have received several awards at film festivals.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate the major developmental phases in early childhood by means of illustrating ten children, ranging in age from four weeks to six years. The program considers development in terms of interactions primarily with the mother, capability for coping with separation from the mother and changing conceptualizations of the mother and strangers. The program presents children and representative developments at the following ages: a four week old infant demonstrating formation of the first social bond; a seven month old boy with his parents demonstrating the stage of exploration of objects and stranger anxiety; a thirteen month old girl illustrating increased communication, object constancy and separation anxiety; a twenty-two month old boy demonstrating mastery of separation from the mother by play and fantasy; a twenty-six month old boy showing language communication and improved ability to play with strangers; a three year old girl showing ability to separate from the mother and increased use of fantasy; a four year old girl demonstrating sex typing and gender role while playing with dolls; a five year old girl demonstrating incorporation of values in her play with puppets; a five year old girl showing increased flow of language in story telling and an increased capacity to use symbols; a six year old boy now at the stage of a 'true social being' demonstrating self-mastery, increased mastery of environment and conscience formation

Abstract: (Critical) This two part module, part of a series on electrophysiology of the heart, discusses disorders of cardiac rhythm. Rhythm disorders due to abnormal impulse propogation are reviewed; common locations and the three degrees of heart block are discussed. Types of ectopic impulse formation are listed and the effects are analyzed. Functional anatomy is described. Previous knowledge of cardiac membrane excitation and conduction is assumed. Reentrant phenomenon is emphasized as a rhythm and conduction disorder. The instructional design allows for feedback, repetition, and reinforcement of learning objectives. The visuals are of uneven quality, but generally clear; the narration is appropriate. This program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) Childhood and adolescent sexuality is the topic of this program. Two facilitators discuss with a group of five 11 year olds various aspects of emerging sexuality including the where and when young people learn about sex, what their sex concept is, their sexual feelings, and the relative discomfort when talking about them. The impact of the program could be improved by a better definition of the objectives and particularly by highlighting some of the issues borne out by the discussion group. Nevertheless, this program is recommended for use in the early training stages of psychiatric nurses and child psychiatrists.

04NLM: WP 870 VC no.2.2 1966
Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe the factors which determine the choice of primary treatment and to discuss the role of radical mastectomy in carcinoma of the breast. In this presentation a clinical classification devised by Drs. Stout and Haganson at Columbia University is presented in which four stages of disease are identified as A, B, C, D. Statistics are then presented in which the survival rate for various age groups are discussed. Data is presented to discuss the potential utility of radical mastectomy versus simple mastectomy and irradiation, and the extended radical versus radical mastectomy. According to this presentation there is a need for an elaborate biopsy to determine the involvement of the lymph nodes. Three groups of patients are identified in which there is considered to be a likelihood of nodal involvement. These groups include patients having lesions larger than 2.5 cm, those with clinical stage B or higher, and those with medial or subareolar lesions regardless of other considerations. According to this presentation the policy now being followed by Dr. Moore is radical mastectomy in clinical stages A or B. The pathologist then examines the lymph nodes. If no positive nodes are found, no further treatment is indicated. If the lesion is associated with positive axillary nodes, the patient receives large field irradiation followed by oophorectomy. With a central or medial lesion regardless of findings in the axillary nodes, internal mammary irradiation is performed.

Abstract: This videotape shows a cholecystectomy and a common bileduct exploration in 70 year old man who has a single episode of abdominal pain followed by painless jaundice. After subcostal incision the abdomen is explored yielding no abnormalities. There is a hard headed pancreas consistent with a single stone. After the enlarged chronically inflammed gallbladder is removed by the retrograde approach the dilated, bileduct yields three stones. The duct is carfully explored and drained. A drainage T-Tube is left in the common bileduct for irrigation and possible later cholangiogram.

04NLM: WJ 300 SL no.3 1971
Abstract: This program reviews the etiology, pathology, and treatment of chronic renal failure. Slides of histologic sections, gross specimens, radiographs and patients with chronic renal failure are discussed in the accompanying text. An etiologic classification consisting of the following broad categories is presented: developmental, vascular, infective, obstructive, hypersensitivity, metabolic, and miscellaneous, such as glomerular disease, hereditary nephritis (Alport's syndrome) and tubular damage. Examples of the physiopathological changes in the kidney associated with diseases in each of these broad categories are presented. Examples of these diseases include polycystic hereditary renal disease, uremic medullary cystic disease, polyarteritis nodosa, chronic pyelonephritis, glomerulonephritis, diabetes and Fabry's disease. The effects of the uremic syndrome in the skin, pericardium, lung and gastrointestinal tract are described and illustrated pictorially. Other manifestations of the uremic syndrome such as hyperparathyroidism, demineralization of bone, and disturbances in calcium metabolism are similarly presented. Treatment of chronic renal failure by conservative means, dialysis, transplantation and surgery is described. The program emphasizes that these therapeutic measures have not been delivered effectively to all those in need. Ninety percent of all 'ideal' patients with chronic renal failure who are now allowed to die could be saved.

Abstract: (Critical) This two part module is a comprehensive discussion of the clinical appearance and the management of the newborn infant with respiratory distress. The physical examination, the initial workup and the major causes of respiratory distress in the neonate are discussed. An overview is presented, in the second tape, of the management of infants with respiratory distress, emphasizing oxygen therapy, temperature control, fluid and electrolyte management, nutrition, and assessment of the circulatory status and acid base balance. This material is logical, practical, and well organized. Controversial areas and biases are clearly identified as such. The narration is excellent and the visualization is clear. The program is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program describes and demonstrates the use of the end-to-end anastomosis stapler (EEA) to create an inverted intestinal anastomosis in gastrointestinal and colon-rectal surgery. Applications and uses are explained, equipment assembly is demonstrated, the surgery is performed in a dog's colon, and the positioning and procedure are demonstrated on a human. No details are given of other uses in the GI tract. Some of the technical aspects are controversial; details of safety lock and type of sutures used for pursestring should be included. Results are not given regarding leakage rate, infection, blood loss, time-saving, and cost effectiveness. The program, overall, is clear. It is recommended for gastrointestinal surgeons and operating room nurses.

04NLM: WQ 210 SC no.1 1971
Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to discuss the clinical use of amniotic fluid. This objective is achieved with the aid of slides of charts, graphs, diagrams, amniographs, and gross specimens. In this presentation the volume and composition of the amniotic fluid is described first. The technique and hazards of amniocentesis are described and discussed. The clinical use of amniocentesis to determine the fetal maturity is then explored in considerable detail. The use of the optical density curve in infants with erythroblastosis fetalis due to Rh incompatibility and ABO incompatibility are discussed. The importance of the lecithin sphingomyelin ratio is stressed in determining fetal maturity. Normal and abnormal amniograms are compared and contrasted. A method for the analysis of amniotic fluid for bilirubin is then presented and discussed in detail. The frequency of these determinations and the delivery of the infant as determined by the results of this analysis are described.

Abstract: (Critical) This program covers gynecologic cytology specimen collection techniques and gross and culposcopic evaluation of the cervix. In addition, reporting mechanisms are briefly discussed. The content is accurate, contains no serious errors and is consistent with the objectives. Unfortunately the material is not well organized and too much information is included for a single program using this media. The material should be divided into several programs. Since there is no other program on this subject using this educational mode, the program is recommended. It is useful for medical students and cytology technicians and of limited use for pathology and OB/Gyn residents.

Abstract: (Critical) This module is a thorough graphic illustration of the first two months of human development. To depict the continuity of development, the program proceeds from embryonic and fetal periods to an organ systems format, as opposed to structuring the presentation on sequential time periods. Included are: musculoskeletal, cardiovascular, digestive, respiratory, urogenital, endocrine and nervous systems, sensor organs and the skin. All the components of this extensive production display superior quality; it is highly recommended for use (including graduate students in the basic medical sciences).

04NLM: WG 140.3 SC no.3.2 1979
Abstract: (Critical) This program presents an approach to the analysis of commonly encountered cardiac arrhythmias. Anatomy of the cardiac conduction system and the physiology of the cardiac cycle are illustrated. Examples of arrhythmias are considered, along with relevant clinical history covering disturbances of sinus impulse formation of conduction, atrial arrhythmias, and AV junctional arrhythmias. The narration is clear and easily understood and the ECG examples are of good quality. Frequent use of abbreviations is a distracting interruption to the program's flow. Some information on management is neither sound nor current; and some important omissions are noted. Although this well organized program is intended for advanced training in cardiology, the shortcomings make it suitable only for medical students and nurse practitioners.

Abstract: (Producer) This program is designed to provide a basic, practical review of common ECG abnormalities. A practical approach is featured to the clinical application of common ECG abnormalities and reproductions of patient electrocardiograms. The production includes ECG tracings, pertinent tables covering diagnostic criteria of myocardial infarction and conditions that may cause a pseudo myocardial infarction pattern. Schematic drawings are also used to illustrate myocardial ischemia, injury and infarction, and the Wolff-Parkinson White syndrome.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an overview of three common viral syndromes of the newborn infant. The transmission of Herpes Simplex, Rubella, and C.M.V. from mother to infant is discussed. Diagnosis, treatment, prophylaxis, and infection control are associated with each syndrome. The importance of early immunization is emphasized. This is an integration of the scientific and pathophysiologic basis of the viral syndromes and the pragmatic needs of the practitioner. The instructional format is logical and progressive; effective use is made of the medium; the production is uniformly excellent. It is highly recommended for medical, nursing, and allied health personnel.

Abstract: (Producer) This two part module, part of a series on clinical electrocardiography, continues an in-depth discussion of cardiac arrhythmias. Recognition of complex rhythm problems is discussed.
Parasystole, atrial dissociation, arrhythmias related to artificial pacemakers, multifocal rhythms, and tachycardias, and reciprocal beats and rhythms are explained by use of schematic drawings, summary tables, and actual patient ECG tracings. Intraventricular, sinoatrial and atrioventricular blocks, ventriculophasic sinus arrhythmia and miscellaneous complex cardiac arrhythmias (including an explanation of electrical alternans and the diagnostic criteria of concealed and supernormal conductions) are included.
Diagnostic criteria and mechanism the clinical entity of 'Chung's Phenomenon' (aberrant trial conduction) are discussed.

04NLM: WX 168 SC no.3 1974
Abstract: (Critical) This program outlines the application of the computer to hospital food service.
The monitoring of patient nutrient intake analysis, food production control, inventory control, and food cost accounting is discussed. Application of basic data from the food item, the nutrient, and the recipe files is described and the components of menu planning, food cost accounts, inventory control, and production control are covered in consideration of the total system.
The material is limited to a single example of computer assisted dietetics, and although it provides comprehensive coverage of that area, it is severely limited in the potential use of nutrient data in patient care. The illustrations and diagrams are confusing and do not support the narrative. This program is recommended for limited use only.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents reviews of five procedures for a congenital anomaly appraisal of the newborn, including checking for polyhydramnios, a single umbilical artery, inspection of the abdomen and the passage of NG and rectal tubes. Conditions associated with each are also discussed. Although the presentation and objectives are well designed, there exists a lack of synchonization of audiovisual portions and only partial coverage of the anomalies. Thus, this program is recommended with reservations for students of pediatric nursing, pediatrics and neonatology.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the information a physician needs to cogently monitor a patient's choice of contraception. Various contraceptive methods are compared as far as effectiveness and side effects, including the rhythm method, spermicidal agents, condom, diaphragm, IUD, oral contraceptives, vasectomy, and tubal ligation. This simple, straightforward firm encourages the physician to facilitate the decision making process by providing their patients with as extensive information as possible. It is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This two part module, part of a series on controlling infectious aerosols, illustrates, through a series of vignettes, the hazards of performing some common laboratory procedures. Common hazards in the microbiological laboratory and how they produce infectious aerosols are depicted. The use and maintainance of laboratory equipment is discussed. Proper use of aerosol-free blenders and centrifuges in preventing contamination are demonstrated. The use of negative pressure (Class I) and laminar flow (Class II) biological safety cabinets in reducing exposure to infectious agents are reviewed.

04NLM: QZ 200 VC no.17 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This program presents a group discussion with six adolescents regarding feelings, responses, and problems associated with their cancerous conditions. Individual concerns, coping methods, peer and family support or rejection, and the effects of chemotherapy are discussed with a social worker; however, there is minimal group interaction, and all the participants, including the interviewer, appear stilted and uncomfortable. The conversation encompasses so many topics that it remains superficial; emotions are not explored in depth; patient concerns and problems are never related to the adolescent period of development; and the group leader does not pursue any obviously leading comments. The technical quality is satisfactory, but could be more sophisticated. This program is recommended with reservations for use.

Abstract: (Producer) In two parts, this program provides a review of all aspects of hypertension. Part I addresses information leading to the decision whether to initiate pharmacotherapy. This includes epidemiologic and physiologic factors, patient evaluation (laboratory tests), and a differentiation of hemodynamics, endocrine and renovascular hypertension. Part Ii presents an extensive appraisal of clinical management of hypertension. It reviews the various antihypertension drugs on the basis of their physiologic effects and the pathophysiologic factors in the specific hypertension. The drugs included among other are: 'older' drugs, beta-blocking agents, prazosin hydrochloride, minoxidil, the renin-angiotensin system blocking agents, saralasin and captopril. Upon completion of this program AMA category 1 CE credit is available.

Abstract: This lecture presentation focuses primarily on the pharmacologic action of ACTH and the adrenocorticosteroids. The nurse's responsibilities regarding the administration of these drugs are noted. Drawings are used to illustrate some of the points presented. Specific topics covered include a review of anatomy and physiology relative to this group of drugs; the purpose of each of the main categories of corticoids, namely, the mineralcorticoids, glucocorticoids, and androgens; the signs and symptoms of Cushing's syndrome which aid in identifying the side effects associated with the administration of the drugs; therapeutic uses; side effects and contraindications, and route for administration and dosage forms of these drugs. Both the naturally occurring and synthetic compounds are discussed.

Abstract: (Producer) This videotape produced for the medical student or resident in otorhinolaryngology examines and demonstrates the anatomy of the nasal cavity using a three dimensional anatomical specimen with overlays of the vascular system feeding the area. General examination and treatment plans are discussed then the following treatment options are demonstrated on live stimulated patients and on the anatomical specimen; cautery, anterior nasal packing using vasalinated-gauze, anterior and posterior packing using the nasal balloon, posterior packing using the Foley catheter, posterior packing using a homemade nasal tampon, and a brief discussion of vessel ligation and embolization using color graphics. This program is unusual in it's clear visualization of both the interior and exterior nasal cavity.

04NLM: W 44 VC no.8 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a series on professional liability, focuses on the credibility of a physician's courtroom image when confronted with a malpractice suit. The importance of maintaining adequate and accurate medical records is emphasized and standards which constitute good medical records are detailed. Ethical questions are raised regarding an immoral alteration of patient records and the apparent advocation of presenting a false appearance on behalf of the physician. The program's title is not an accurate reflection of its content as the issue of physicians' general credibility before individual patients and the public is not addressed at all. Although the program accurately and realistically covers an important and current topic, extraneous material, broad allusions, and misleading statements are noted. It is recommended with reservations for use under the auspices of an expert in medical jurisprudence.

04NLM: WY 160 VC no.11.3 1977
Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a series on the neurologically disabled patient, discusses four major problems of the acutely ill neurological patient: respiratory failure, aspiration, infections, and increased intra-cranial pressure. Preventive and therapeutic interventions are demonstrated including clapping, vibrating, and suctioning procedures. More emphasis is placed on techniques than on principles or the etiology of problems and clinical changes associated with the therapeutic interventions. A critical component in the technique of turning the quadriplegic patient was not observable. Charts illustrating the relationship of intracranial pressure and various factors were not explained. This clear, well-designed program is recommended with reservations for baccalaureate nursing students and staff nurses.

Abstract: (Producer) This program, as part of a series on the borderline patient, presents indicators of therapeutic progress or cure in the format of comments by Dr. Searles. His first comments deal with the relative meaning of cure inasmuch as cure can only be partial in the borderline patient. Important signs of progress are conflict resolution and the emergence of playfulness in the therapeutic exchanges. The latter is indicative of achieving therapeutic symbiosis with relaxation of ego boundaries and of meaning of things. Another important sign is the lifting of an anamnesis gap regarding childhood with an ability to tolerate accurate rememberance of life history. Finally, the ability to integrate positive and negative feelings is a sign of progress.

Abstract: This program extends the scope of morphologic diagnosis to involve common findings of disease and to verbally acquaint the viewer with the concept of diagnosis on the basis of the distribution of skin lesions. The beginning of the program presents drawings which illustrate the distribution pattern of lesions of various dermatologic diseases. The remaining illustrates with photographs of clinical examples the following: morphology of clinical lesions; pigmentary disorders; nail changes; vascular abnormalities; and internal disorders of the skin.

Abstract: (Producer) Ideally, general histology and general pathology should precede the study of neuropathology, and clinical neurology and neurosurgery should be studied at the same time as neuropathology. Since this is not always practical, the student may experience some difficulty with this program due to a lack of background instruction. Should questions of terminology and concepts arise, the student should refer to an appropriate reference source.

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and illustrate DNA, RNA, and protein synthesis. This objective is achieved with the aid of schematic drawings, molecular models, chemical formulas, diagrams, animation, electron micrographs, and histologic slides. In this presentation the molecular structure of DNA is explored first. A plastic model of the DNA molecule is also presented to demonstrate its three dimensional appearance. DNA synthesis which involves the splitting of the existing molecule at the level of the hydrogen bonds is then described. Each half of the molecule is immediately completed by joining with free nucleotides forming two new molecules identical to the existing molecule. The splitting of the DNA molecule also results in the synthesis of RNA. According to this program only one half of the molecule is duplicated; the other half leaves the nucleus and travels to the cytoplasm where it forms messenger RNA, transfer RNA and ribosomes. Many chemical reactions then occur which result in the synthesis of RNA. These specific chemical reactions are described in detail. In protein synthesis several amino acids bond to the molecules of transfer RNA. A peptide bond is formed between the amino acid and the carboxyl group of the previous amino acid. The peptidal transfer RNA shifts to the peptidal site of the ribosome, displacing the transfer RNA. The messenger RNA moves along the ribosome by one codon. This elongation stage repeats until the peptide chain is complete. This chain is then released from the ribosome messenger RNA complex. This reaction is catalyzed by protein factors at a termination codon.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents an approach for explaining the use of the rubber dam in children and introduces three techniques for its application. An instructional guide which is exceptionally supportive of the video presentation accompanies the tape. Some of the close-up photography could be improved, especially during the placement of the rubber dam clamp. Although the program is intended for use by the dental student, dental auxiliary, residents, in pedodontics would also find this material worthwhile. This precise and well-organized instructional package will be useful for years to come and is highly recommended for use.

04NLM: WE 15 VC no.1 1979
Abstract: (Critical) This program provides instruction in the names and location of the chief bones of the human skeleton. Associations of the sound of the names with unrelated or fantastic objects provide 'audionyms' for purposes of verbal recognition. This method does not apply to the written form and is likely to foster misspelling. Systemic, rather than regional, anatomy is emphasized, contrary to current professional instruction, and functional details and organ relationships are not considered. Information about the bones is negligible and inaccurate and too much time is spent communicating relatively little information. Vernacular and technical names are used interchangably and inconsistently. The program is not suitable for college or professional level instruction and is recommended for limited use only. Although designed for self-instruction, this program requires additional instruction for proper use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program illustrates the progressive development of the human vasculature. Characteristics of the six stages of prenatal growth up to the completion of fetal circulation, are detailed. The principles of collateral circulation are emphasized, but the functional aspects and dynamics of the developmental changes are not considered. Even though the visual and audio quality are very clear, previous familiarity with vascular development is necessitated by the program's fast pace and the amount of material presented. This program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This program demonstrates both the technique of blood pressure measurement and the attributes of the resulting readings. After a short discussion on the use of blood pressure measurement as an aid in diagnosis, there is a description of the equipment required, a demonstration of its use, and an explanation of the various components of blood pressure sounds. The program concludes with five practice blood pressure determinations so that viewers can record their own readings. The program is supplied with an answer sheet for the practice blood pressure determinations, as well as graphs showing inter- and intra-observer variations experienced when using the program in the teaching of first year medical students. In clinical medicine, the program can be used to teach students how to take blood pressure measurements. In clinical epidemiology, the program can be used to demonstrate various attributes of measurements, differences between reliability, and validity of measurements, and digit preferences.

Abstract: (Critical) This program reviews the major causes of dementia, stresses the increasing prevalence of these conditions, considers differential diagnosis and etiology of dementing conditions, presents a clear clinical picture of the mental status changes diagnostic of dementia, and addresses the management, particularly of Alzheimer's disease, in the psychiatric, home, and chronic care settings. The material is generally clear, but some information is deficient. Short shift is given to causes of dementia other than Alzheimer's and, in general, to neurobiology and current research, and much of the discussion of the role of society and the social service resources is relevant only to Ontario. The material is of limited usefulness to specialists in neurology or psychiatry, but is recommended for general physicians, medical house staff, medical students, nurses, social workers, occupational therapists, and the general public.

Abstract: This program depicts the floor mounted, wall-mounted, mobile, and chair mounted intra oral dental x-ray equipment. The concepts of inherent filtration, added filtration, shielding and radiation protection are covered. Positioning of the long and short cone is demonstrated. It was stated that KVP should be kept constant and the Ma varied. This is in error as the penetration quality is a factor of kilovoltage. This presentation is most applicable for assistances, but the long cone method of intra oral films gives higher quality radiographs and should be stressed over the short cone bisection technique.

Abstract: This program consists of edited segments from psychiatric interviews with five patients ranging in age from 5 to 69 years old who suffer from clinical depression. The purpose of this program is to demonstrate three aspects of depression: the way a patient presents himself and his feelings, the theme of loss of someone of something important to the person, the ways of coping with the loss. The program begins with a brief discussion by Dr. James Ryan on the purpose of this presentation. The interview sessions are then presented in chronological order. The first interview is with a five year old girl who is separated from her parents. This patient uses denial to cope with the loss of her parents. During the interview she states that her parents are dead. The second interview is with a 15 1/2 year old boy who runs away from home when his father is dying of cancer. The program notes that avoidance is a typical adolescent way of coping with loss. The third interview is with a 26 year old depressed woman who describes her inability to achieve personal, professional and social goals. She describes her suicide attempt and self-inflicted cigarette burns as a means of coping with her depression. The fourth interview is with a 54 year old female lawyer who has recently experienced a loss of both parents. This patient copes with these losses by an addiction to codeine and elixir of terpin hydrate. The final interview involves a 69 year old man who has suffered from depression since his daughter's marriage. This patient partially masks his depression by relating numerous physical complaints.

04NLM: WG 106 VC no.6 1980

Abstract: (Producer) Using a hydraulic model of the cardiovascular system, Dr. Anderson demonstrates why he believes that the human heart is a non-sucking, intermittent outflow, continuous inflow pump and that there are two separate sets of determinants of cardiac output, only one of which can be operative at any given time. The first set is applicable when the heart is in Pump Energy Excess (a term which Dr. Anderson defines in the program) and the second set of determinants is applicable when the heart is in Pump Energy Failure (again, a term defined by Dr. Anderson during the presentation). This program is ideally suited to all medical, nursing and allied health audiences being introduced to the concepts of cardiac output.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a newborn series, presents a routine approach to determining gestational age. Time constraints important in the procedure are specified. The physical examination is demonstrated in step-by-step detail. Characteristics and risk are illustrated. Practical comments regarding use of classic gestational age assessment tools are provided, but the comments come across as very opinionated. The slides range from very poor to excellent quality. Overall the material is accurate and the format clear. This program is recommended with reservations for use.

04NLM: WV 272 MP16 no.4 1976

Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates the importance of hearing tests for very young children. Conditioning children to respond to auditory stimuli for purposes of assessing hearing levels is explained, but the severe consequences of undetected hearing impairments in the prelinguistic stages of childhood are not emphasized. The difficulties in establishing control and the value of soliciting parental assistance in the testing process are detailed. Some additional techniques--shaping, cueing, and modeling--are mentioned without discussion. Ineffective reinforcement procedures are warned against, but remedial measures are not suggested. No mention of play audiometry or brain stem audiometry is mentioned; the focus is only on operant conditioning. The material is well organized; the narrative and visualization are well integrated. This progrem is recommended for audiologists, otologists and communication personnel.

1. Bone Development - motion pictures I. Cormack, David H. II. University of Toronto. Division of Instructional Media Services.

04NLM: WE 200 MP16 no.1 1975

Abstract: (Producer) Animation is used with photomicrography to present, as a continuous process, the development and growth of a typical long bone. Beginning in the sixth week of embryonic life, the presentation describes step-by-step the development of the cartilage model of the humerus, the process of endochondral ossification, the growth of bone and finally, the fusion of epiphyses with the shaft. The nutrition, growth and remodelling of bone cartilage are also included. Designed for first year medical students, the module uses a basic approach to achieve a marked visual impact. The program is designed for use by those studying the histology and embryology of bone development.

04NLM: WB 290 VC no.13 1979
Abstract: (Producer) In two versions of an interview with the same patient, this program demonstrates an approach to obtain an accurate, unbiased account of an illness. The clinician develops hypotheses by working with a broad base of information, and tests them by additional questioning, physical examination, and studies. The interviews provide a basis for discussion of behaviors that facilitate and inhibit the gathering of clinical data. The first approach employs a more directed line of questioning; the flow of communication is limited as the physician attempts to fit the responses into predetermined categories of disease. The style is more facilitative in the second interview. An opportunity is provided for the patient to respond in his own way, and the content of the physician's questions is based on these responses. Psychologic data relative to the onset of the illness are obtained. This material is appropriate primarily for medical students in the clinical years of training.

Abstract: This program presents the principles of an interview designed to clarify and confirm the biological and social facts which provide a longitudinal view of an individual's life. According to Dr. Tapia, the interview should be goal-directed, evaluate specific aspects of the child's total personality such as impulse control, relationships of the child's self to others, cognitive sophistication, and the accuracy with which the child views himself and others. A play period designed to test the neurological responses of the child can also be included in the interview. Brief excerpts of interviews with Dr. Tapia and four children are provided to illustrate these principles. The first child is a six year old male who has made serious attempts to kill himself. The second child is a girl who has difficulty accurately perceiving herself and others. The third child is a young boy who is hyperactive and is evaluated primarily from a neurological point of view. The fourth child is a girl who is considered to be a hysterical neurotic. Dr. Tapia provides background information before the interview and discusses salient features following the interview.

04NLM: WG 300 SC no.8 1980
Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the diagnostic techniques in coronary heart disease. The clinical history, physical examination, and laboratory findings are discussed. The role of the apex cardiogram, echocardiogram, and treadmill test in chronic coronary heart disease is reviewed, as well as nuclear imaging and coronary arteriography. A broad knowledge of clinical medicine and coronary artery disease is assumed. Underlying reasons for abnormalities and problems are not discussed. The information is variable: some inappropriate material is included while relevant and important material is omitted. The emphasis and presentation are uneven; at times simplistic, at times advanced. Format and organization are commendable; the narration is generally good; some slides are too complex. The program is recommended for family practice and internal medicine residents and, with supplementary reading, for medical students and nurse practitioners.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents various electrodiagnostic and acoustic tests for making a site of lesion diagnosis supranuclear, nuclear and peripheral in cases of peripheral facial paralysis. This includes, among others, stapidius reflex test, electrogustometry, submaxillary salivary gland secretion test, nerve excitability, and electromyography. Methods of treatment for idiopathic facial paralysis are described.
Central nervous system lesions associated with facial paralysis are not discussed and, in general, this program falls short of a comprehensive discussion of the subject.
The visualization is clear and accurate. It is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents the subject of describing findings in an oral physical examination. The color of oral lesions is treated and physiologic explanations for the color changes are discussed. This program is generally well done, however, several deficiencies exist both in content and on a technical level. The presentation is very long and drawn out and treats, in a very complicated manner, a very simple subject. Technologically, the audible tone which indicates when slides should be advanced is missing and some sides are poorly duplicated. Because of these deficiencies, this program is recommended for a limited audience of oral pathology and dental hygiene students who have previous background in morphology and location.

04NLM: WL 359 VC no.3 1971
Abstract: This program demonstrates certain neurological clinical findings for the purpose of aiding physicians in determining whether or not a patient is suffering from Parkinsonism. Initially, the film discusses such symptoms as tremor, rigidity, akinesia, kyphosis with assumption of simian stance, and facial masking with reptilian stare in a person with Parkinsonism. Special attention is paid to illustrating the tremor associated with Parkinsonism. The following examples of this tremor are shown: pill rolling, rotary movement of the forehead, tremor of the shoulder, tremor at the ankle, foot tapping, tremor of the chin and hand. The film then compares and contrasts these physical findings with familial, senile and action tremors which are also demonstrated in individuals with these particular clinical findings. In addition, the program demonstrates such clinical findings as pseudoparkinsonism, rigidity, gegenhalten, semiwillful resistance, demetia, organic brain syndromes, Creutzfeldt-Jakob syndrome, and Steels Richardson and Olszewski syndrome.

Abstract: This program describes and illustrates, through animation, the significant developmental changes which occur at specific stages of fetal growth. The demonstration starts with the sex cells already lodged in the genital ridge, and concentrates on showing the histodifferentiation of the cells of the inner surface of the fetal genital ridge into those comprising the ovarian cortex with its primary follicles and vascular medulla. A picture of a four week old, 6 mm. long human embryo is shown, followed by diagrams illustrating the transverse section of this embryo. 'Germinal' epithelium, early cell cord, sex cell, and mesenchymal cells are identified at this stage. Then diagrams of embryos 11 mm. and 17 mm. long are shown illustrating the development of the gonads into ovaries. The proliferation of the germinal epithelium cells and mesenchymal cells, in addition to the initiation of the primary follicle by the oogonium and follicle cells at six months is described in detail. The developmental changes occurring at seven and eight months, however, are only briefly mentioned. The program concludes with a diagram illustrating a section of the ovarian cortex and a cross section of the ovary at birth to indicate the general plan and state of organization.

04NLM: WI 100 SC no.6 1977
Abstract: (Critical) This three part module reviews the general anatomy of the digestive system. The major perspective is that of macroscopic anatomy, but this is supplemented with each area's histology. The oral cavity, the tongue and tonsils, and the larynx and esophagus are illustrated. Although a thorough understanding of embryology is necessary for a complete understanding of the adult anatomy, this information is not covered in detail. The information is accurate and reviews and self-tests are fully consistent with the material presented, but the extensive detail may restrict the range of audiences for whom this program is appropriate. The visual quality varies: the designs could be improved for clarity and the text is sometimes illegible. The program is recommended with reservations for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the ramifications of providing the general public with information about methods of committing suicide. Victims of painful and terminal illnesses and their families are depicted, some advocating suicide and some its alternatives. Meetings of the Society for the Right to Die with Dignity and conferences to legalize euthanasia are presented. Aspects of the controversy are considered by lawyers, physicians, and patients. The audio quality is somewhat unclear and the educational design is not very sophisticated. Nevertheless, this is a good presentation of a difficult subject and it is recommended for use.

Abstract: This videotape presents the operative procedures on a 21 year old female patient with a history of dysmenorrhea since age 13 and disparunia during intercourse. An earlier abdominal exploration had revealed extrauterian endometriosis. Vaginal exploration reveals a tight cervix which is dilated. Subsequent abdominal approach shows a retroverted uterus which is fixed anteriorally, and a spot of endometriosis is removed from the right utero-sacral ligament. Finally presacral neurectomy removes the prescaral plexus with the intent of relieving the primary dysmenorrhea. The entire length of the operation is demonstrated with no follow-up of the postoperative patient.

Abstract: (Critical) This program provides complete and detailed instruction in an alternative method of decubitis care. The use of direct water irrigation appliance for treating ischemic ulcers is demonstrated. Suggestions are made for using this technique in the home, as well as in the hospital. The technical quality, length and pacing are excellent, but the addition of an audio cue would improve synchronization. The program's educational objectives are achieved and it is highly recommended for undergraduate or graduate physical therapy students, nursing students, resident physicians of all specialties involved in care of spinal cord injured patients.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents an interview with parents of a malformed infant. Their reactions of grief, guilt, anger, and blame are discussed and the process of adaptation to the special needs of their child is described. Their experience in the hospital and with the professional intervention of a nurse clinician are discussed in both negative and positive lights. The development of love for the infant and the reverberations on the parents' whole life and value system is verbalized. Objectives are not clarified and the educational design is ambiguous. The background music is depressing and the video is somewhat distracting, but the direction and editing are well done. The material may be too long and overdramatic for some audiences; multiple viewings may be superior to one. This program is recommended to promote sensitivity for medical and nursing personnel.

04NLM: WL 100 SC no.1 1972
Abstract: This program discusses reactions to injury as found in the nervous system. Several relatively common diseases are described to illustrate the changes which take place. Slides depicting gross specimens and histologic sections are used to illustrate certain points.
The mesodermal and ectodermal elements of the central nervous system are described. The reactions to injury of the mesodermal elements are discussed first. Changes in these elements as a result of the following diseases are included in the discussion: bacterial meningitis, purulent meningitis, brain abscess, and cryptococcal meningitis. The role of microglia and gitter cells in injury to the mesodermal elements is also described. The changes in the ectodermal elements of the central nervous system are then identified. The effects of hypoxia, anoxic changes in the brain, kernicterus, carbon monoxide poisoning degeneration of neurons, chromatolysis pyknosis, wallerian degeneration, amputation neuroma, degeneration of axonal injury, neuronophagia, astroglial changes, gemistocytic astrocytes, Alzheimer type II astrocytes, brain sand or corpora arenacea, satellitosis, tissue changes, ferruginization, neurofibrillary tangles, and senile plaques are discussed. Manifestations of some of these changes as they appear in such diseases as Alzheimer's disease, organic chronic brain syndrome, and Tay-Sachs disease are also described.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a slide atlas of cardiography, describes the overall morphology of complicated congenital malformations in which both the pulmonary artery and the aorta arise from a common ventricle. The pathologic, radiologic and angiographic manifestations of a variety of uni-ventricle conditions are visualized in diagrams, echocardiograms and EKG's. This is an accurate, current assessment of diagnosis and management. This comprehensive overview of neonatal abnormalities is well-organized and well-integrated. This program is highly recommended for use.

Abstract (Critical) This module, one in a newborn series, discusses the effects of a pregnant woman's ingestion of drugs on the fetus and the newborn. Drugs are listed with their potential complications and birth defects. Statistics from existing and retrospective studies are discussed. Substance classifications are reviewed. Treatment of drug withdrawal and management of associated abnormalities are covered. This information is generally accurate, but is somewhat specific to the area of production. The informality of the language and presentation are distracting. The program is recommended with reservations for use

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an interview with Dr. Lothar Kalinowsky, a pioneer in the development and use of electroshock therapy. His extensive clinical experience is summarized, the history and rationale of electroshock therapy is presented; conditions in which electroshock therapy is indicated are described. The medical model of psychiatry is discussed. Considerable information is presented, but in such a dry, boring format it is not easily retained. Some of the opinions expressed are controversial. Although of limited general interest, this material is recommended for historical purposes.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for all hospital employees and staff and for those students who are preparing to work in a hospital. This program presents techniques that can be used by one person to remove a hospitalized patient who is endangered by fire. Guidelines for patient removal are discussed. The removal of ambulatory patients using the side-by-side assist is demonstrated. Then techniques used to remove patients who are not ambulatory—the blanket drag, the hip carry, and the pack strap carry—are presented in detail. This program is available in a wide range of formats from 35mm filmstrip through videocassette. It also contains preview and review exercises as part of the instructor's guide.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for all hospital employees and staff and for those students who are preparing to work in a hospital. This program presents step-by-step demonstrations of techniques that can be used by two or four persons to remove a patient from a fire area. Guidelines for performing a safe and rapid maneuver are briefly reviewed first. The two-person swing carry and two-person extremity carry are demonstrated. Then the four-person blanket carry is also shown. Emphasized throughout the program are the teamwork and practice necessary for effective emergency patient removal. This program is available in a wide range of formats from 35mm filmstrip through videocassette. It also contains preview and review exercises as part of the instructor's guide.

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to discuss and demonstrate one approach to more efficient handling of emergency room trauma victims. This objective is achieved with the aid of clinical subjects, emergency room personnel, diagrams, and scenes from accidents. This program stresses the importance of the team approach in the initial evaluation and care of the accident victim. In this presentation the triage system of sorting patients is described, and the importance of intercommunication between the triage officer, ambulance attendants, hospital personnel, and other hospitals is discussed. The training and staffing patterns for the triage officer and other emergency room personnel are described. The location of ancillary services relative to the emergency room is also discussed. A typical trauma room is presented and the supplies and equipment are described in detail. According to this program trauma victims arriving at the emergency room are categorized or triaged into one of three groups according to the extent of injuries. These three groups include those with injuries which interfere with vital physiologic function, those whose injuries are severe but not life-threatening and those whose injuries produce occult damage. The important aspects of initial treatment are identified and include institution of an airway, simultaneous resuscitation and control of hemorrhage. Other diagnostic and therapeutic measures for each group are discussed. The program stresses the importance of having one physician in overall control at all times and of using frequent consultative services.

Abstract: (Critical) This excellently organized, well produced program nicely covers a poetntially confusing subject. The discussion defining histologic types and grading of endometrial carcinoma is well organized. There is a timely presentbation of the types and importance of staging classifications along with the tissue type and grade. Application of these to patient prognosis and therpy is covered. The discussion of pathology and its application to clinical management is extremely well done. The clinical discussion is slightly abbreviated which results in possible confusion. Unfortunately, the terms adenocarcinoma, adenoacanthoma, and adenosquamous carcinoma are used in a rapid repetitive fashion which is difficult to follow.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a series on basic skills for the EMT, is an overview of common environmental injuries. A basic review of burn anatomy and evaluation is presented, as well as the initial field management. Eye burns, oral exposures, smoke inhalation, electrical burns, radiation exposure, heat stroke, cold injuries, and drownings are among the conditions reviewed. The narration is concise and is well supported visually; lists and outlines are simple and clear. The material is well organized. Although some omissions are noted, the information is useful overall. While it is inappropriate as a comprehensive study, this program is highly recommended for use as an excellent review of the topic.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the diagnosis, risk assessment, and management of Rh isoimmunized pregnancies. It addresses the importance of postpartum anti-D (RhoGam) prophylaxis. The team approach in management of erythroblastosis fetalis is stressed. A detailed history, Coombs antibody test, seriel amniotic fluid analyses, Rh committee conferences, intrauterine fetal transfusion, and administration of anti-D gamma globulin to prevent hemolytic disease are featured. Material progresses in an orderly fashion with the nature of the problem, potential fetal effects and possible outcome. It is dated in its exclusion of ultrasonic fetal evaluation, and the omission of other issues, such as the types of antibody titers performed by clinical laboratories. Because this contains useful information it can serve as a basic introduction to patient management, but it must be supplemented by additional material.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a series on extended skills for the EMT, reviews the proper use of the Esophageal Obturator (EOA) and the Esophageal Gastric Tube Airway (EGTA). Basic airway management is discussed, including suctioning. Endotracheal and Esophageal Intubation are differentiated, as are the Esophageal Obturator and the Esophageal Gastric Tube Airway. Management and transportation of an esophageally intubated patient is covered and the procedure for pre-hospital removal of either device is demonstrated. The program does not cover the techniques and proper method of Endotracheal Intubation.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for all hospital employees and staff and for those students who are preparing to work in a hospital. This program begins with a review of the purpose and basic procedure of an evacuation in the hospital. Then specific roles performed by the hospital staff during an evacuation of a clinical unit are demonstrated. Safety precautions and procedures for evacuating ambulatory patients and visitors, non-ambulatory patients, and patient records are shown. The responsibilities of an assigned loading team, carry team, and moving team are emphasized for application to the clinical unit. This program is available in a wide range of formats from 35mm filmstrip through videocassette. It also contains preview and review exercises as part of the instructor's guide.

04NLM: WY 160 VC no.7 1977
Abstract: (Critical) This program presents information related to the pathophysiology and classification of seizure disorders using the new international classification system. Nursing care of the patient with a seizure disorder is described including preparation for an electroencephalogram. The written instructional material is more complex than necessary to meet the objectives and lacks sufficient opportunity for self-testing. The videotape was obtained through continuous video surveillance of a nursing unit whose patients are seizure prone and demonstrates various types of seizures, both naturally occuring and induced. Under these circumstances the 'fuzzy' quality of the audio and video aspects of the tape are understandable. Nursing care concerns are well presented in the written materials and, for the most part, good role modeling is seen. However, it would have been helpful if more explanation had been done concerning the need to restrain patients to preserve transnasal EEG leads during an induced seizure. Overall, the uniqueness of the videotape overcomes these weaknesses and the program is highly recommended for both nursing students and medical students.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a series on the occupational health nurse in practice, reviews the evaluation and management of low back pain. An overview of the pathology and clinical signs and symptoms is presented. Causes of the syndrome, particularly those related to the work environment, are considered. The physical examination covers a thorough evaluation of musculoskeletal functioning. The practitioner portrays a positive role model for students. Patient history and the information necessary to make a differential diagnosis are delineated. The discussion of management measures could have been more through. Diagrams, visuals, and demonstrations are well integrated. The program is clear, detailed, and well organized. It is highly recommended for use.

04NLM: WL 710 MP16 no.1 1974
Abstract: (Critical) This program adequately surveys the use of laboratory, otologic and audiologic tests in the evaluation of vertigo. Lesions of the eighth nerve are compared with others of the vestibular apparatus. Appropriate use of electronystagmography is demonstrated. However, the neurologic examination and history-taking of the dizzy patient are not addressed adequately and the program really deals with only a small portion of the evaluation of a dizzy patient. Thus, even though the photography and sound track are excellent, the program is recommended with reservations for otorhinolaryngologists, audiologists, neurologists, neurosurgeons, pediatricians and allied health professions students in ENT.

04NLM: WP 815 VC no.1 1974

Abstract: This teaching presentation demonstrates step-by-step the examination of the breasts and axillae of both male and female clinical subjects. With the patient seated and her arms at her sides, the examining physician inspects both breasts and nipples. The patient is asked to raise both arms over her head and then to press her hands against her hips. With each maneuver the physician inspects the breast contours. With the patient lying prone and a small pillow under her left shoulder, the left breast is palpated using three fingers in a rotary motion to compress the breast tissue against the chest wall. The entire surface of the breast including the periphery and tail are thus examined. The nipple is palpated and compressed between the thumb and forefinger. The pillow is shifted and the right breast is examined in similar fashion. The male breast is then examined by inspecting and palpating the nipples. The examination of the axillae is performed on the male subject. With the patient sitting with his arms in a relaxed position, the examiner supports his wrist with one hand while examining the axilla with the other. With the fingers of the left hand cupped, she palpates the central, pectoral, subscapular and lateral nodes of the right axilla. She then uses her right hand to examine the left axilla in similar fashion.

04NLM: WP 141 VC no.2 1974

Abstract: The presentation describes and demonstrates step-by-step the physical examination of the female genitalia, anus and rectum on an adult clinical subject. With the patient draped in lithotomy position and the physician seated on a low stool, the physician inspects the external genitalia. The labia are separated and labia minora, clitoris, urethral orifice and vaginal opening are inspected. Each labia is palpated. Skene's and Bartholin's glands are checked, and the vaginal wall is inspected as the patient bears down. The closed speculum is warmed and inserted at a 45 degree downward angle. The blades are rotated and opened, and the thumb screw is tightened. The cervix is inspected. Three specimens are obtained and prepared for cervical cytology. As the speculum is slowly withdrawn the vaginal mucosa is inspected. The index and middle fingers of the right hand are inserted into the vagina and the left hand is placed on the abdomen midway between the umbilicus and symphysis pubis. The abdominal hand is pressed toward the pelvic hand to palpate the uterus and right ovary. The hands are reversed to palpate the left ovary. The index finger is reinserted into the vagina and the middle finger into the rectum. The maneuvers of the bimanual examination are repeated to palpate the area behind the cervix. The anus is inspected and the index finger is inserted into the rectum to palpate the rectal walls.

Abstract: (Producer) A five year old Caucasian boy is presented with a large, soft, immobile, asymtomatic, non-tender abdominal mass. The diagnostic procedures, including barium contrast enema, i.v. pyelogram, angiogram and CAT scan show displacement of abdominal organs, and the ureter, and involvement of major blood vessels. The surgical intervention is demonstrated resulting in the removal of a 1660 gram benign fibromyxolipoma or lipoblastomatosis. Finally, the boy is shown 24 months post-operative in a healthy condition.

Abstract: (Producer) This three part module, part of a basic nursing series, reviews eye, ear, and nose irrigation and installation. The removal of secretions, foreign bodies, and other irritating substances and prevention of additional damage and cross-contamination are demonstrated. Instilling ear medication to treat infection, reduce discomfort, or loosen packed cerumen is discussed. And the introduction of solution into nares to shrink swollen membranes and manage infection is detailed with an emphasis on the prevention of injury to mucosa. This self-instructional program offers immediate feedback as to the learner's progress. Explanation of the principles underlying these skill provides reinforcement for the material.

Graphic sequences are integrated with examinations to illustrate internal and external structures of the eyes, ears, and nose as well as the mechanics of basic functioning. Visual acuity, visual fields, pupillary response to light, consensual response, and muscle imbalance are tested, and location, size, shape and symmetry of lids and brows are observed. The lacrimal gland, nasolacrimal duct, conjunctive, sclera, cornea, and iris, are among the areas covered. Ophthalmoscopic, otoscopic, and speculum examinations and auditory acuity tests are presented. Patency of nostrils, nasal mucosa, septum, and turbinates are covered.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the problems faced by stepparents. Group discussion focuses on feelings of resentment, and confusion and Dr. Margaret Kailey presents the sociologic perspective. This is primarily an experimental program, with no integrated instruction or therapeutic suggestions. The technical components are acceptable, but the educational design is minimal. This program is recommended for use as a stimulus to discussion.

04NLM: WB 205 VC no.11.9 1982
Abstract: (Producer) This program demonstrates the procedure for doing a vaginal and rectal examination. The presentation begins with the patient being assisted into the lithotomy position and draped. Explanation of each step and monitoring for facial expression and muscle tension are stressed throughout. A graphic sequence shows the relationship of the internal structures. Proper insertion of the speculum is shown and an example of the vagina of a patient with a total hysterectomy is included. Intravaginal palpation is demonstrated, followed by another graphic sequence to illustrate the relationship of the structures involved in the rectovaginal and rectal examination. After reexamination of the uterus, the anus and rectum are examined with attention to sphincter tone during palpation.

Abstract: This program presents an interview between a patient and her physician. Slides illustrating the form used to elicit information from the patient are employed. Facts regarding the reasons why some of the questions need to be asked along with the medical significance regarding the answers are written on the slide and encircled in red. The program focuses on the medical history of the patient and does not include the physical examination of the patient. The patient is a twenty six year old woman in apparently good health who had a daughter two years ago. Her only problem during this pregnancy seemed to be with varicose veins. She had a spinal anesthetic during delivery which is described as normal. She also had pneumonia as a child and infectious mononucleosis as an adult. She has, in the last few months, been bothered by cystitis and has seen a urologist. She also had some difficulty with hay fever last summer. Her family history revealed that her grandmother had cancer and two of her grandparents had strokes. She describes her usual diet and is told about her dietary needs during pregnancy and the reason why she does not need vitamins. She seems to feel that she would not like to breast feed. The types of anesthesia available to her and her preferances in this matter are explored. The costs of her obstetrical care are also discussed.

Abstract: This presentation demonstrates the preoperative fluid and electrolyte management for a patient with intestinal obstruction. The estimation of the extra-cellular fluid deficit, and the therapeutic measures used to correct these deficiencies are described in detail. A detailed medical history of a 57-year-old female patient is presented prior to her admission into the emergency room in the hospital. Diagnosis is made in order to establish the site and cause of the obstruction, and to determine the quantity of fluid and electrolyte deficiency. Routine examinations including blood test and x-rays are made. The x-rays reveal a small bowel lesion and obstruction. An intravenous transfusion of 1,000 cc. of 5% glucose in isotonic sodium chloride is prescribed. Detailed calculation of the patient's fluid requirement is then made, based on the clinical and hematocrit results in addition to the formula that 20% of the lean body weight is the extra-cellular fluid. In this case, about 25%-30% fluid loss is established. Three different I.V. solutions, isotonic sodium chloride, molar lactate, and dextrose in water are then prescribed to correct the deficiency before the patient goes to surgery

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for nursing students, for nurses in refresher programs, and for nurses in clinical practice who are updating their knowledge of emergency burn nursing. This program begins with a discussion of the importance of fluid resuscitation to the burn victim to restore circulatory dynamics. Alterations in physiology that occur at the site of the burn injury as well as the generalized vascular changes are presented. Nursing responsibilities in fluid resuscitation are identified and discussed. These responsibilities include: calculation and administration, assessment of patient response to fluid therapy, modification of fluid administration, and accurate documentation

Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a series of forensic medicine teaching programs, discusses the various methods of determining identification of unknown bodies. Examination of the skull and skeletal remains to determine age, sex, and race is discussed. Other topics include fingerprinting, physical characteristics useful in identification, x-rays, and serology. An anthropological presentation contrasts animal and human skull and discusses previous disease in the bones especially the skull and pelvis. The importance of odentology is emphasized in section which provides demonstrations of on-site disaster identification techniques. This program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) In this program a patient is interviewed who is suffering from terminal breat cancer. The interview ranges from discussing dissatisfaction with health care providers and their difficulty in dealing with death to the more theoretical yet practical implications of living wills. The husband of the patient joins the last 15 minutes to provide his perspective on the dying process. The presentation is done well, except for the fact that there is very little emotional content to this highly charged subject. In the video taping process affect is removed to some extent, and this particular patient, while extremely articulate and verbal, does not present some of the emotionally charged feelings other than in a descriptive way. Overall this program presents and touches on many of the subjects that patients with terminal diseases must deal with. It appears particularly useful for ancillary and support personnel involved in oncology services as well as for beginning nursing and medical students as an orientation to the issues a dying patient must confront, with particular emphasis on the need of open information from the health care personnel. The program is not designed for advanced students. It is recommended.

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to present some of the principles in the management of injuries to the frontal sinus. This objective is achieved by means of photographs and x-rays in addition to a motion picture featuring the osteoplastic flap, a fat graft obliteration operation. The objectives of therapy are the reduction of the fracture, the repair of the dura and central nervous system injuries, elimination of the deformity and the prevention of sequelae. Several cases are presented using x-rays and photographs. The etiology of the injury, the pathology involved and the treatment utilized in each case is described. These include fractures and injuries to the frontal sinus and problems which arise when the frontal sinus injury is over-looked or improperly treated. The use of tantalum mesh, silastic sheeting and temporalis fascia grafts are also discussed. The presentation closes with a motion picture demonstrating step-by-step the osteoplastic flap, fat obliteration procedure. A small incision is made into the abdominal wall to remove a small piece of fat tissue. This tissue is placed in a physiologic solution. A coronal incision is made just inside the hairline through the galea, a flap is formed and turned down while preserving the innervation to the forehead. The periosteum of the frontal sinus is removed, and all mucosa, submucosa and bits of epithelial tissue are removed from the area. A temporal muscle fascia graft is used to plug the nasofrontal osteum and the opening of the opposite frontal sinus. The previously obtained fat pad is trimmed and carefully placed in the frontal cavity to obliterate the air space. The osteoplastic flap is replaced and the periosteum of the bone is sutured to the periosteum of the skull. The forehead skin flap is replaced and the skin incision is closed. No postoperative complications have been noted with the use of this procedure.

Abstract: (Critical) This program illustrates the functional anatomy of the hand. Prehension patterns of power grip, precision grip, sensibility testing with two-point discrimination, and the picking-up test are demonstrated. The biomechanical forces that occur about the joints and the flexor tendon mechanism with grasp and pinch are described. The material will maintain a historical interest as it reviews the opinions of one of the leaders in the field of modern hand reconstruction. The format is logical, although the illustrations are generally clear, some are on the small side. A thorough knowledge of basic hand structure and anatomy will greatly facilitate comprehension of this information. The program is recommended for use.

04NLM: WY 150 VC no.15 1977
Abstract: (Critical) This program, part of a series on basic skills, is a discussion and demonstration of blood pressure measurement using a sphygmomanometer. The content is basic, concise, and clear. Visually, the technical quality is excellent, but the audio quality is variable, particularly the systolic and diastolic sounds for self-testing. Little discussion of the physiology related to blood pressure measurement or of the other vital signs is included. The material is generally accurate and well organized. It is recommended for undergraduate, technical/vocational nursing students, and allied health students.

Abstract: (Critical) This seven part module discusses trauma, and emergency medical services. Prehospital assessment and stabilization, the initial hospital evaluation, radiological evaluation, laboratory evaluation, multiple traumas, radiation exposure in emergency physicians, chest traumas, and shock and fluid therapy are among the topics covered. This is simply a taped symposium that does not take advantage of the media. The narration is of dubious quality both in content and delivery. The information, which is at a basic level and of a quite local nature, is more of a potpourri than a focused review. The program is not recommended for physicians and is recommended for very limited use for nursing and allied health students.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a clinical allergy series, examines a variety of chronic nasal complaints. Recognition, evaluation, and management of the common nasal disorders are covered. The discovery of IgE and its interaction with mast cells is presented with extensive clinical information relating to differential diagnosis. Allergic rhinitis, acquired nasal deformities, polyps, sinusitis, and mastocytosis are among the topics discussed. Other causes of chronic nasal symptoms, such as vasomotor rhinitis, drug-related disorders, and polyposis are also covered. Precise histories are presented which explore chronology and temporal relationships, including environmental factors.

04NLM: WP 400 SC no.2 1973
Abstract: (Critical) This program appears to be an attempt to formalize Reagan's cytologic principles of cell and nuclear size. There are several questionable cytologic and histologic photomicrographs which are stated to show neoplasia. The realities of cytologic diagnosis (the principles of nuclear morphology) are submerged beneath an extensive discussion of complex material, some of which is of questionable accuracy. For example, in adenocarcinoma, inflammation and radiation may produce considerable nuclear variation which cannot always be resolved by measuring nuclear volume. The fundamentals of cytology are not well stated and technical terminology is used. For these reasons, the audience is limited to pathologists at a graduate level.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an introduction to gnotobiotics in production of experimental animals. Isolation, sterilization and its maintenance, supplies, and microbiologic monitoring are covered. The information is accurate, current, and concise, practical experience in a laboratory setting is necessary for full comprehension. The technical quality is generally good, the narration is clear and well integrated with the slides. This is a large amount of information which, although logically organized, is presented at a rapid pace. Overall this production is well done and is recommended for personnel in the areas of animal health, nutrition, immunology, disease pathogenesis, and epidemiology.

Abstract: This program focuses primarily on the pathological features of granulomatous inflammations, particularly those of tuberculosis. Slides of histologic sections, charts, and drawings are used to illustrate certain points. The characteristics of granulomatous infection shared by the diseases considered to be classical granulomatous diseases are identified. The pathological and morphological features of the granuloma itself are discussed. Variants of the granulomatous process associated with the following are described: Blastomyces hominis, Coccidiodes immitis, granuloma annulare, and rheumatoid nodules. The destructive mechanism of the granulomas are then listed. The major portion of the program describes tuberculosis and how it differs from other granulomatous and pseudogranulomatous diseases. The other diseases described include atypical mycobacterial pulmonary disease, histoplasmosis, sarcoidosis, pneumoconioses, silicosis, anthracosis, berylliosis, and atypical necrotizing granulomas. Emphasis is placed on the varied manifestations of granulomatous diseases, and the multisystem involvement that is frequently observed.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in the series of famous teachings in modern medicine, discusses the pathologic aspects of three asbestos-related diseases: asbestosis, lung cancer, and mesothelioma of the pleura. The information is valid, relevant, and current, but some bias is revealed in the omission of areas of controversy. The clinical and epidemiological information is too sketchy; the material lacks breadth. Several discrepancies are noted between the slides and the narrator. The production is well designed but poorly integrated. For the purposes of education in pathology of these diseases, the material is excellent and well presented, but its deficiencies detract significantly from its usefulness. The program is recommended for limited use.

04NLM: WP 320 MP16 no.1.3 1970
Abstract: This program illustrates, through animation, the gross form changes and descent of the ovaries in a human embryo from five weeks to birth. The changes are depicted first from a coronal view of the ventral surface of the organs, and then from a transverse view of the cut cephalic surface. The internal organs and the urogenital ridges of a 9 mm. long embryo are identified on the diagrams. The gradual form and position change of the young gonads in relation to the kidneys and adrenal glands is demonstrated at different developmental stages of the embryo. The gonads are shown to be shifting in the caudal direction until they reach the pelvis. The program notes that this internal descent is not an actual migration of the free organs, but rather a relative shift owing to a faster elongation of the body trunk in the cranial direction in contrast with the slow growing ovary. When the embryo is 24 mm. in length, the female ducts and the ovaries become more recognizable. The gross conditions of these organs at birth are demonstrated in a diagram, outlining a dissection of the ovaries and female tract. Other diagrams are included to show the transverse view of the ovaries in development. The ovarian mesentery and other landmarks of a 38 week fetus are identified on a diagram.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a lab animal medicine series, covers the anatomy physiology, reproduction, nutrition, and pharmacology of the guinea pig. Vital signs, growth, blood peculiarities, and the animal's reaction to antibiotics and anesthesia are discussed. Some overlapping with other units in the series is noted. The production is professional and the packaging good. The lack of a written syllabus and summary detract from the overall effectiveness of the program; however, it is still recommended for veterinary students and animal technicians.

1. Animals, Laboratory - slides I. Clark, J. Derrell II. American College of Laboratory Animal Medicine III. Washington State University, Pullman. College of Veterinary Medicine IV. Series
04NLM: QY 50 SC no.1.7 1975
Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a lab animal medicine series, discusses the biology and husbandry of the guinea pig. An introduction and general husbandry techniques are presented. The material is well organized, relevant, and accurate. Some figures are outdated. Overall the program is well designed and the quality is good. This is recommended for veterinary students, advanced animal technicians, and medical investigators using animals for research purposes.

Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates the application of the halo-brace to patients with cervical spine fractures and other problems causing instability of the neck. The value of immobilization and the components of rest are reviewed. Line drawings are effectively integrated to clarify the procedure. Clinical indications for use of the halo and nursing care of the patient are covered only briefly, while the use of the device during surgery is discussed in depth. This clear presentation meets its objectives and is recommended for orthopedic and neurological surgeons, as well as nurses, physical therapists, and other involved in care of patients with unstable cervical spines.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a lab animal series, presents the anatomy, physiology, and pharmacology of hamsters. Diseases, such as enteritis, bacterial diseases, viral diseases, parasites, neoplasms, amyliodosis, and polycystic disease, are discussed. Some of the information is outdated, particularly the disease and treatment sections, and some is repeated in other units in the series. The material is logically organized, but it could be condensed. Incorrect or uncommon pronunciation of terms is noted. The lack of a written syllabus or summary detracts from the instructional effectiveness. The program is recommended for use.

04NLM: QY 50 SC no.1.21 1975

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a lab animal medicine series, is an introduction to the hamster. History, use, reproductive and sexual behavior, husbandry, sexing, handling, and diseases are discussed.

The material is superficial and elementary, emphasis are misplaced, and some information is outdated. A monotone speaker and excessive length detract from the overall effectiveness. The technical quality is professional and the organization is clear and logical.

Although the program is intended for veterinary and other biomedical science students, it is too elementary, and is better suited to an introductory course for animal technicians or handlers.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, one in a basic nursing series, demonstrates important skills and their rationales. The proper technique for washing hands to prevent infection and disease before and after patient contact is reviewed. The correct technique for opening sterile packages and donning sterile gloves is presented with a review of the principles of asepsis. Strict isolation techniques, including gowning, gloving, masking, and removing articles are outlined. The self-paced program offers immediate feedback to the learner and provides effective motivation and comprehension.

Abstract: (Producer) Part of a health employee training series, this program details the proper handwashing procedures to use in preventing the spread of disease.

Identification of activities and conditions requiring washing, use of proper washing and rinsing methods on the hands, turning off hand-lever type faucets after washing, and knowing the number of times hands must be washed and rinsed to be clean are stressed. Ways to prevent chapping and cracking of the hands due to handwashing also are discussed.

Abstract: (Producer) This slide/cassette program describes the more commonly seen dermal ridge and flexion crease patterns associated with trisomies 13, 18 and 21 (Patau Syndrome, Edward Syndrome and Down Syndrome). Patterns are clearly illustrated and occurrence frequencies are noted. A simple technique for recording significant dermal and flexion patterns is demonstrated. The accompanying Instructional Guide provides an illustrated summary, frequency of occurrence table, references and a duplication master of a useful 'Dermatoglyphics Documentation Form'. Although part of a series, it is a complete presentation in itself for the intended audience of neonatal and perinatal pediatricians and residents.

Abstract: (Producer) This slide/cassette program prepares the physician to provide an appropriate explanation of occurrence and genetic counseling to parents of affected infants. It describes the genetic mechanisms leading to a trisomy syndrome (including non-disjunction, translocation and mosaicism), and the importance of karyotypes in diagnosis and counseling.

The program provides a review of normal meiosis and mitosis, and offers suggestions for providing the type of support and counseling needed by the parents involved. An Instructional Guide includes a content summary, references, a table of recurrence risks and illustrations suggested for use in genetic counseling of parents. Although part of a series, it can stand alone as a useful resource for all physicians assessing and caring for newborns.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed to educate practitioners regarding the use of the Tektronix 413 Neonatal monitor. The program is written and designed so that the learner is guided through a 'hands on' session with the monitor. Thus, the access to the 413 monitor is a prerequisite for the successful completion of the program. The program also provides a fairly thorough review of the principles of respiratory, heart rate, EKG, and direct blood pressure monitoring.

Abstract: (Producer) This self-instructional slide/cassette program is designed to provide information about the insertion procedure to those who have never inserted an unbilical artery catheter or who have never inserted a catheter when the cord is dried and shriveled or when the modified cut-down procedure is needed. This program may also serve as a review by those not performing this procedure on a routine basis. Part One includes common uses, contraindications and alternatives, and sequence and rationale for each insertion step. Part Two includes insertion practices for a dried and shriveled cord, the modified cut-down procedure when umbilical structures are difficult to visualize, procedures for drawing blood samples, and catheter maintenance practices. The title was awarded second place in the Still Media Festival at the Health Sciences Communications Association 1981 annual meeting.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is a documentary of a moderately retarded adolescent male who engages in self-abuse. A step by step treatment program is outlined and the treatment goals are specified. Many terms are not defined; the audience must have some background in operant psychology to fully understand the material. The patient's routine within the institution was not described and explanations of changes in behavior and aproaches are not provided. The technical quality was variable, but not distracting from the content. The program is recommended for workers in the field of developmental disabilities with a background in operant psychology.

04NLM: WB 205 VC no.11.1 1982

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a visual guide to physical examination series, demonstrates the procedure for use with the head, face, mouth, and neck. This thorough examination begins with observation of the shape, size, position of the skull, hair condition and distribution, and scalp inspection. A detailed survey of the face for shape, symmetry, and skin condition follows. Variations of pigmentation in black or dark-skinned patients is shown. The inner and outer surfaces of the mouth are inspected. Regions of the neck, trachea, and thyroid are examined. Graphic sequences are used throughout to identify the location and appearance of organs, muscles, glands, etc.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses difficulties in the evaluation of a child's hearing. A technique for auditory testing of young children and handicapped children is outlined and one form of operant conditioning is described. Other techniques and forms of conditioning are not covered and the reliability of the one used is not mentioned. Examples of very young, mentally retarded, emotionally disturbed, autistic, hearing impaired, and multi-handicapped children are depicted at various stages in the conditioning process. Aside from fluctuating sound levels, the technical quality is acceptable. Some material is omitted, some irrelevant, and some superficial. However, overall, the information is useful; it is recommended for pediatricians, teachers of handicapped children, and professionals in the field of communication.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents a discussion of the current insights and approaches to problems of sexual dysfunction, including an assessment of management techniques and their prognoses. The inconsistent, unstructured material varies from a tightly organized in-depth exposition on the problem areas to a more casual, almost rambling, consideration of the etiology and underlying factors. A thorough editing of the material is required to alleviate the dilemma created by too much extraneous information to hold the interest of the knowledgeable viewer while insufficient structure renders the production inappropriate for the beginner viewer. The videotape is recommended with reservations for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This program, as part of a series on the psychotherapy of the borderline patient, presents in the format of a dialogue with Dr. Searles, the psychotherapist's feelings regarding the psychotherapeutic situation. Dr. Searles emphasizes the inevitability of self-doubts and the feeling of helplessness and irrelevance. Particularly difficult is the autistic patient's ability to draw the therapist into his own sphere of terror. Dr. Searles shows that these feelings are an inevitable event in the psychotherapy of some borderline patients.

04NLM: WM 274 SL no.2 1981
Abstract: (Producer) This module is an overview of the hematologic aspects of alcohol use. Major hematologic effects of alcohol and alcoholic liver disease are summarized. The overview covers the causes of anemia in alcoholics, abnormalities of erythropoiesis, folate and iron deficiency, blood loss, and mechanisms of hemolysis. Defects in hemostatic mechanisms in alcoholic patients; abnormalities in the number and function of platelets, diminished vitamin k-dependent clotting factors, impaired deactivations of circulating plasms factors are summarized. Causes of increased incidence of infection in alcoholic patients, abnormalities of the granulocyte production and function, impairment of macrophage function, deficiency in serum bactericidal factors, and numerical and functional abnormalities of T-lymphocytes are discussed. The module integrates graphs, charts, diagrams, and photomicrographs of bone marrow and peripheral blood smears. Each slide is reproduced in a loose leaf text which is accompanied by a detailed legend and related bibliography. This material is appropriate for use in nursing, biochemistry, pharmacology, medicine, and health science education.

1. Ataxia Telangiectasia - videocassettes I. Pickens, James, 1927- II. University of Missouri--Columbia. Medical Center. Educational Resources Group. III. University of Missouri, Columbia. Dept. of Physical Medicine and Rehabilitation.
04NLM: WG 700 VC no.1 1976
Abstract: (Critical) This program is adequate as a straightforward lecture about an uncommon condition. An early state of hereditary ataxia telangiectasia is shown, but the later stages are not. The program omits visual presentation of some aspects, such as telangiectasia. There is one inconsistency. The impression is left that the disease in inexorably progressive, yet an unillustrated patient apparently improved in ambulation over a 15 month period. Management is only lightly touched upon. The only approach offered for infection stemming from the immunological defect is antibiotics. Physical therapy is recommended with no discussion of rationale for use or evaluation of effect. At one point, the program states that a pathologist is involved in treatment (perhaps what is meant is immunologist). Overall, this is a useful, if incomplete, presentation of a rare condition. It will serve to alert physicians to an unusual cause of progressive ataxia, dysmetria and athetosis. The role of allied health personnel is only mentioned briefly.

1. Accident Prevention - filmstrips 2. Hospital Departments - filmstrips 3. Safety - filmstrips I. Trainex Corporation.
04NLM: WX 185 FC no.2 1974
Abstract: (Producer) This program surveys the safety hazards in the non-medical departments of a modern hospital and suggests ways to avoid them. Using animation, the program covers administrative offices, central supply, the laundry, maintenance, and engineering, radiation, and x-ray therapy. It concludes with two guiding principles -- neatness and caution -- which, if followed conscientiously, would drastically reduce the number of hospital accidents. This program is designed for nursing students, personnel orientation, and as continuing education for nurses in clinical practice.

University of Arizona. Health Sciences Center. Division of Biomedical Communications. IV. Title V. Title: Siblings of children with cancer VI. Series
04NLM: QZ 200 VC no.25 1981
Abstract: (Producer) This program is one in a series on Adolescent Cancer, intended to sensitize members of the patient care team to the motives, needs and wishes of these patients and their families. In this videocassette program, the siblings of three cancer patients describe their perception of cancer's impact on their family and themselves following the death of a sibling. Important points of the discussion include: the surviving siblings' need to be informed about the disease and its progress; the need to participate in care and be with the patient; and the need to talk and express feelings both during the illness and after the sibling's death. The children identify positive and negative aspects of the experience and offer advice to other siblings, to parents and to members of the health care team. This tape would be best utilized with a group made up of staff from all levels and service areas...those who have frequent contact with patients and their families. The Discussion Leader's Guide suggests questions to encourage discussion of important points and relate these to the experiences and feelings of members of the group.

Abstract: (Critical) This program, part of a symposium on hypertension in office practice, provides the fundamental and practical rationale of the necessity to control blood pressure. The underlying principles of antihypertensive therapy are explained and the consequences of no therapy are described. The omission of further rationale from the Hypertension Detection and Follow-up Program (HDFP) dates the material somewhat, but it is excellently organized and clearly presented. The program is highly recommended for use as a review of this topic.

Abstract: (Producer) This module presents animation of the left and right heart demonstration, IHSS of moderate severity with synchronized sounds and murmurs, and simultaneous display of sound notation and pressure curves. Events taking place during a single cardiac cycle are explained demonstrating in turn the generation of the fourth heart sound, the mitral and tricuspid components of the first sound, the late ejection systolic murmur, and the aortic and pulmonary components of the second sound. The cycle of the left and right heart is shown repeatedly, first slowed down and then at a normal speed.

Abstract: This program demonstrates a modification of the Obwegeser procedure used in reconstructive oral surgery. According to the program, the purpose of this demonstration is to 'illustrate the convenience and comfort experienced by those patients with whom the authors have used their improved technique in the preparation and use of the oral stent.' The program achieves its objective by showing the office and operative procedures performed on a patient. The office procedure consists of obtaining a compound impression, applying acrylic and extending the splint. Next, the surgical preparation and placement of the stent are demonstrated. The first step shown is the taking of a skin graft from the buttock. In this surgical procedure, the mucosa is incised from the mandibular periosteum in the lower jaw. At this point, the program uses a model of the mandible and colored strings to illustrate the location and repositioning of the mental nerve in the newly fashioned channel devised in the mandible. The program then demonstrates the fitting of the extended stent as it is applied on the skin graft for the purpose of obtaining an impression. The final placement and securing of the stent withcircumferential wires is then illustrated. Seven days postoperatively the stent is removed and a temporary denture is prepared with anterior teeth added. The film summarizes the advantages of this modification of the Obwegeser procedure, namely, the decreased time in the operating room, the improved skin graft and the increased postoperative comfort and safety.

Abstract: This videotape demonstrates the abdominal incisions used for cholecystectomy, namely: (1) right subcostal incision, (2) right paramedian muscle incision and (3) the hockey stick incision used especially in cases of obesity. This latter incision is also helpful for full abdominal exploration a procedure which is demonstrated in detail. Finally, a cholecystectomy for cholelithiasis is shown. The gallbladder is found thickened with a single cholesterol stone. No patient follow-up is given.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is a demonstration of the surgical technique for insertion of the Indiana Conservative Total Hip. Appropriate anatomy is reviewed, indications for surgery are discussed, the advantages of the posterior approach are explained, and the rationale and underlying principles are outlined. The procedure, equipment, femoral alignment, and placement of prosthesis are illustrated in radiologic examples and a cadaveric demonstration. The visual quality is variable but the narration is excellent. This material would be valuable for any practicing orthopedic surgeon and for residents in training; it is highly recommended for use.

04NLM: WS 141 VC no.7.1 1978
Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a pediatric examation series, illustrates an approach to the physical examination of infants. Various techniques for inspecting male and female genitalia and for evaluating heart and lung sounds are demonstrated. The musculo-skeletal system is discussed in detail. The importance of establishing rapport with the child and soliciting parental involvement is emphasized. The production is visually weak and the content could be more comprehensive. Neurological and developmental evaluations are omitted. The examiner exhibits some difficulty in relating to both the audience and parent at the same time. Although the objectives are unclear, this is recommended for limited use, in conjunction with other instructional material, as an introduction to or review of this topic.

04NLM: WS 430 SC no.1 1976
Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the potential problems that may develop in infants of diabetic mothers. Information concerning infants at risk and how to identify them is presented as well as the pathogenesis of some of the problems of infants of diabetic mothers. The symptoms and management of hypoglycemia are also considered. The presentation contains several deficiencies including a lack of clearly stated objectives, superficiality of content, and a failure to include information concerning the incidence or prevalence of the various problems that are listed under the general subject of infants of diabetic mothers. Thus, this program is recommended with reservations for pediatricians, obstetricians, neonatologists and nurse practitioners.

1. Communicable Diseases - slides 2. Nervous System Diseases - slides I. Willson, Nicholas Joseph, 1938- II. Series
04NLM: WL 100.3 SC no.1 1979
Abstract: (Critical) From a neuropathological point of view, this program discusses infections of the central nervous system, and examines the pathologic features with respect to their location, the nature of the infectious agent and defenses of the host. Infectious diseases are broadly classified and these groups are compared and contrasted. Specific infections are referred to only to illustrate a particular type of pathology. The narrative, text, and slides are appropriate, substantive, and clearly presented; however, consistant use of arrows to identify the subject under discussion would be helpful. The production's length precludes sustained concentration in a single viewing; the material can probably be more effectively asssimilated in several sessions. This module is recommended for use.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to show how the neurotic defense mechanism of compensation is often used to conceal a sense of inferiority. This is accomplished by presenting two patients who demonstrate this compensatory behavior. The program begins with an introduction by Dr. James Ryan concerning such possible sources of inferiority as weakness of bodily organs, smallness as a child and cultural pressures toward conformity to the social norm of masculine power. The presentation notes that neurotic defense mechanisms can fail when they are relied upon too much as shown by two patients. The first patient illustrated in this presentation is a fifty-four year old man who throughout his life, sought to disprove his fathers belittlement of him as a 'cowardly little cur.' This patient's neurotic compensation is shown by his dependency needs expressed in the form of alcoholism, frustration and inadequacy in his marital relationship, and suicidal depression. The second patient shown in this presentation is a sixty year old man who has attempted to compensate for the 'shadow of mental illness in his family' by training his memory to perform outstanding feats. The patient demonstrates a suicidal depression as a result of his retirement which deprives him of the intellectual compensation he has relied upon all his life. The program notes that this patient received six electroshock treatments without any significant effect on his depressed mood.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an overview of inflammatory bowel disease. Statistics on the prevalence of digestive complaints in the U.S. are presented. Crohn's disease and ulcerative colitis are distinguished from one another and from other idiopathic diseases of the bowel. Terminology is defined and conditions and procedures are explained. The emphasis is placed on comprehensive care of three patients with differing conditions. Pharmaceutical and nutritional approaches are discussed. The superficial nature of the material makes it less useful for physician specialists than for dieticians, nurse clinicians, physician assistants, nurses, and medical students. The program is recommended for use.

Abstract: This program describes and demonstrates the dissection of the infratermporal region on a prosected cadaver. Both the temporal and infratemporal fossae are studied although just the infratemporal fossa is dissected. The dissection is preceded by a careful examination of the skull. Cineradiography is also used to show the movement of the mandible on the temporomandibular joint. The jaw is removed for better visualization. The styloid process had been broken off. The structures which overlie the ramus of the mandible are then identified. The zygomatic arch is then cut in front and behind the masseter muscle and the parotid duct is cut and pushed out of the way. The zygomatic arch is reflected downward. A saw is used to make a sagittal cut through the mandibul.r joint. A portion of the head of the mandible and the temporomandibular joint is removed. Horizontal cuts are made and a portion of the mandible is removed. The coronoid process and temporalis muscle are lifted up. The nerve and blood supply to the region with special attention to the maxillary artery and the trigeminal nerve are reviewed. Scissors are used to remove the head of the mandible.

Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates methodology for insulin administration. Necessary injection equipment is discussed, the anatomical location of injection sites is identified, and the injection process is outlined. The administration and concentrations of regular and modified insulin are compared, but the types of modified insulin are not explored. The stated objectives are effectively met. This clear, concise, generally current production is well organized. Although further instruction and demonstration may be needed, the content is relatively complete. This program is recommended for use as a logical demonstration of the sequential stages of insulin injection.

Abstract: This lecture presentation discusses insulin and the oral hypoglycemic agents. Drawings are used to illustrate certain points. The program discusses the physiological action of insulin as a hormone and its role in carbohydrate metabolism. Insulin's uses as a pharmacologic preparation are also discussed. The three categories of insulin, namely, fast acting, intermediate and long acting are identified. The preparations included in each category are discussed in reference to their onset, peak action, and duration of action. The nurse's responsibilities in administering these drugs and the observations regarding the patient's condition which should be made following their administration are noted. The symptoms of hypoglycemia are described and discussed to aid the nurse in fulfilling these responsibilities. Additional points covered include: the methods by which insulin can be administered, the technique for administering insulin and complications such as presbyopia which can be associated with the administration of insulin. The pharmacologic action and side effects of the oral hypoglycemic agents are also discussed but in considerably less detail.

04NLM: WB 115 AC no.1 1979
Abstract: (Producer) The intensive Review has been developed from a week-long course that was presented in Boston and which was attended by more than 500 physicians. The course was divided into 13 sub-specialities and included 54 lectures and nine clinical case presentations that simulated a section of the American Board of Internal Medicine Certifying Examination. The lectures that were presented in Boston were revised for self-study by the faculty members who delivered them, and have been professionally narrated on 32 audiocassettes. The division of the lectures into sub-specialites is retained.
These specialties include the following areas: Pulmonary Disease, Endocrinology, Oncology, Hematology, Dermatology, Radiology, Cardiology, Infectious Diseases, Gastroenterology, Allergy/Immunology, Nephrology, Rheumatology and Neurology. There are more than 700 illustrations and tables and they are correlated with the audiocassette presentations. Also included with this Intensive Review is a booklet containing a comprehensive examination that follows the style of the examination given by the American Board of Internal Medicine. Completion of the accompanying computerized examination is required to obtain CME credit for 45 hours in Category 1 toward the Physician's Recognition Award of the American Medical Association.

04NLM: QY 450 SC no.3 1975

Abstract: (Producer) This program approaches the interpretation of clinical blood gas measurements from the physiologic viewpoint. It emphasizes the abnormal mechanisms that produce hypoxemia and hypercapnia, and stresses the importance of understanding the underlying physiology. Actual examples of the application of blood gas analysis to patients in a variety of situations are used to teach the viewer how to distinguish between the various causes of hypoxemia. The viewer learns to detect hypoxemia due to decreased ventilation, shunting, and abnormal matching of ventilation and blood flow. The physiologic principles of oxygen therapy are included in the discussion of case material.

Abstract: (Producer) This program is a dramatization of the family of an alcoholic working woman. The roles and contributions of the family members in the initiation of a recovery process and the assistance provided by a counselor are depicted. Dramatic scenes portray the alcoholic passing through stages of suspicion to attempts to stop drinking. The intervention preparation provides information on the illness of alcoholism and the family's involvement in it. Common fears, problems, possible outcomes, and rewards of intervention are presented. This program is suitable for a wide range of audiences from professional to lay. Awards include: Silver Screen Award (1979), United States Industrial Film Festival; Golden Eagle Certificate (1979), Cine Festival; Honorable Mention (1979), San Francisco Film Festival; Chris Statuette Award (1979), Columbus Film Festival; Ammy Award (1979), American Medical Writers Association Film Festival; and Second Place in its category (1979), Mental Health Association Film Festival.

1. Radiography, Dental - slides I. Herrick, Merlyn. II. McKay, Darrell. III. University of Missouri--Columbia. Medical Center. Educational Resources Group.
04NLM: WN 230 SC no.2 1976
Abstract: This program presents useful information on the parallel technique and outmoded bisection technique for intraoral dental radiographic examinations. Proper patient head x-ray tube positioning, types of intraoral x-ray film, and cone angulation are demonstrated for the maxillary and mandibular arch. The presentation contains several errors. The bump on the pebbled surface of the film packet is pictured as being visible - it is not. A 14 film survey is inadequate to visualize all areas. The use of the No.2 film in the lower anterior area can lead to bending of the film with resultant distortion. Good quality films do not result when bent by thumb pressure. The weight of the long cone is not a negative factor in the long cone parallel technique. The reviewer feels that the program should be brought up to date by utilization of the parallel technique instead of the outmoded bisection technique.

Abstract: (Critical) This program gives excellent coverage from a pathophysiologic and a retrospective neonatal sense of intrauterine growth retardation. It lacks certain elements of obstetric or prospective considerations as it omits environmental assessments including estriol and HPL levels, the oxytocin challenge test, and serial sonar studies for growth rate. It also fails to include cytology as a maturity test and places too much value on osmolality determinations. It would be best used by medical students and pediatric nurses as an adjunct to clinical training.

04NLM: WL 16 VC no.2.2 1978
Abstract: (Producer) This program provides a systematic approach to the investigation of two actual epidemics (Minamata disease in Japan and organic mercury poisoning in Alamogordo, New Mexico). It shows patients and discusses environmental circumstances which, when studied critically reveal the etiology of the neurologic disorders presented. The program illustrates the usefulness of cohort analysis in descriptive epidemiology through discussions relating to Parkinson's disease.

04NLM: WL 102 VC no.3 1977
Abstract: (Critical) This program reviews the ionic basis of both resting and action potentials in the nerve. The role of the sodium/potassium pump for maintaining ionic gradients and the differential function of sodium and potassium in the rising and falling phase of the active potential are noted. The explanations are somewhat simplistic and superficial and are not sufficient to gain full understanding of the action potential. In spite of the elementary nature of the presentation, a background in chemistry and physics is necessary for the student. The program is recommended with some reservations for health science students at the undergraduate level.

Abstract: (Critical) This program uses patient interviews to depict hospitalization from the patient's perspective. Patients discuss feelings of abandonment, boredom, apprehension, and ignorance, and express the need to feel more human and less like a machine. Focus is on orienting the hospital staff to the fears and frustrations of patients. The effect of each hospital member's role on the individual patients is portrayed in a reassuring interview between housekeeping personnel and a patient. This program is recommended for nursing students, nurse's aides, and volunteer workers.

Abstract: (Critical) This program summarizes the processes supporting chemical neurotransmission. The neurotransmitter is related to sites of synthesis and storage. The release process, interaction of receptors on effector cell, mechanisms for terminating the actions of transmitters, and action of drugs which alter synaptic efficacy are among the topics discussed. This production is a model of neurophysiology teaching and will serve equally for introduction, review and updating. The material is superbly demonstrated and the language is accessible to students of biology in any category. The program is highly recommended for use.

1. Bottle Feeding - videocassettes I. Title
04NLM: WS 120 VC no.2 1975
Abstract: (Critical) This program reviews the political, social, and economic aspects of third world populations affected by bottle feeding. The consequences of bottle feeding--diarrhea, dehydration, and malnutrition--are depicted in the slums and rural areas of Nairobi. Measures to combat advertising with educational classes on the value of breastfeeding are discussed. The dramatic portrayals contribute to the biased presentation of the topic. This is not an objective historical overview or a scientific analysis of the data; rather, it is an impassioned, technically excellent presentation of the problem. Although it should not be presented without the balancing guidance of a qualified instructor, the program is recommended with reservations for use as a stimulus to discussion.

04NLM: WU 240 MP16 no.2 1968
Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and demonstrate several experiments which have been done by workers in dental research laboratories to determine the exact pathogenesis of periodontal disease. This objective is achieved with the aid of clinical patients, x-rays, drawings, diagrams, animation, photomicography, histologic slides, structural models and demonstrations of the experiments. The purpose of dental research being conducted now and in the future is also discussed. In this presentation the normal anatomy and physiology of the mouth is discussed and described first. Then the origin of plaque, its relation to the tooth and the etiology of periodontal disease is discussed. According to this presentation collagen is the most important protein in the tissues which hold the tooth in the jaw. Gnotobiotic studies are cited in which collagenase was isolated in tadpoles. Experiments are then described in which collagen was extracted and purified from rat skins and broken down by gum tissue taken from patients with periodontal disease to demonstrate the presence of collagenase in human beings. Other experiments are then described in which collagenase is further isolated and purified. The program notes that the exact relation of this enzyme to periodontal disease has not been determined; that dental research is still being done along these lines and that interest in this enzyme is apparent in other areas of general medicine. The program cites the detection of increased amounts of collagenase in cultures of the skin of patients with certain neuromuscular diseases and in the joint fluid of patients with rheumatoid arthritis.

Abstract: This program details, with the aid of a prosected cadaver, the dissection of the larynx. The anatomical features of the intact larynx are initially studied both internally and externally. The relationship of the larynx to the other structures in the neck is described. The laryngeal branches derived from the superior and inferior thyroid arteries and veins which supply the larynx are described as is the innervation of the larynx by the external and internal branches of the superior laryngeal nerve and the recurrent nerve. The extrinsic and intrinsic muscles, ligaments, and cartilage of the larynx are also identified. A dissection of the larynx so that its internal structure can be effectively visualized is also included.

1. Larynx - anatomy & histology - slides I. University of Missouri--Columbia. Dept. of Anatomy. II. University of Missouri--Columbia. Medical Center. Educational Resources Group
04NLM: WV 501 SC no.1 1979
Abstract: (Critical) This program illustrates the gross morphology of the human larynx, including the muscles, nerves, blood vessels, and structure. Well drawn colored charts of front and side views are clearly labeled. The slides, text, and audio descriptions are good; however, some errors in pronunciation and factual data are presented. The organization is poor: an overview of the larynx should precede the breakdown into components. Some slides are disorienting, especially those with multiple views. Although the information concerning laryngeal function is somewhat dated, the program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This package is designed for undergraduate medical and nursing students, residents, all emergency room staff, psychologists, social workers, paramedics, EMT's, and other professionals involved in the delivery of mental health services. After viewing the videotape and discussing its contents, the viewer should be able to identify several important symptoms and signs relevant to the assessment of each patient, be able to assess the examiner's technique, identifying strenghts and weaknesses in the approach to each patient and suggest alternatives; and experience greater comfort with psychiatric patients in an emergency setting. This videotape and instructional guide are designed to be used in a group setting with an instructor. The content is not a comprehensive presentation of emergency psychiatry but a stimulus to discussion. Although designed for presentation to pre-clinical students, this package can also be used with advanced audiences. The five case vignettes can be used together to provide an overview, or separately in teaching specific problems. Suggested discussion points have been built into the videotape. We recommend that at each of these points the videoplayer be stopped and the questions discussed. The five cases demonstrate: the inaccessible patient, the violent patient, the anxious patient, the depressed patient, and the psychotic patient.

Abstract: (Producer) This program focuses on lecture quality in terms of content, organization and delivery. Pace, conversational manner, eye contact, facial expression, hand gestures and body movements are discussed. Other suggestions focus on using summaries and transitions, examples and authorities, and establishing ground rules. There are examples of effective and ineffective lecturing techniques. Additional references are suggested, as well as guidelines for those who wish to videotape their own lectures for evaluation.

Abstract: (Critical) This program consists of color slides with a syllabus of diagnoses that graphically depict a wide range of skin disorders including autoimmune and metabolic diseases, tumors, and several viral infections. Although the topic is broader than can be presented in a brief program, the slides are of excellent quality and accurately portray the disease entities. The collection is lossely grouped together but the presentation suffers from the lack of a written or audio component. It is recommended for limited use by dermatologists who need resource photographic material for instructional purposes.

Abstract: This program describes and demonstrates on a prosected cadaver the dissection of the abdomen, liver, duodenum, and pancreas. The mesenteric small intestine and the large intestine have been removed from the specimen used. The stomach and celiac trunk have been dissected. The course of the mesenteric artery and vein is noted. The parts of the duodenum are then identified and the liver is revealed and such structures as the common bile duct and portal vein are examined. An incision through the peritoneum just right of the descending colon is made. The pancreas is reflected to the common bile duct. The head of the pancreas is dissected. An incision is made in thw wall of the descending duodenum and its features are noted. Dye is then injected into the bile duct to see how it flows. Another cadaver is used to show the internal structures of the duodenum. The body and head of the pancreas with its ducts are then described as is the common bile duct. The celiac trunk and the hepatic blood supply are observed. Emphasis is placed on the arteries and veins which supply the organs described in this program. The liver is then removed and examined in detail.

04NLM: WI 700 ST no.1 1971
Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and illustrate three aspects of the liver: embryology, gross anatomy and histology. The presentation is divided into three distinct sections to discuss each of these aspects. The program achieves its objectives by means of diagrams, summary charts, slides of the liver in situ, sterograms, representational drawings and electron micrographs. The first section, on the embryology of the liver discusses its origin, the intergrowth of liver cells and vascular channels and the development of the following components: hepatic bud, hepatic diverticulum, growth and rotation of the duodenum, bile ducts, portal vein and ductus venus. Next, the slides depict the gross anatomy of the liver by outlining its location, and anatomical features. The parts of the liver shown in this section are rflections of the falciform ligament, peritoneal relations, porta hepatis, the imaginary H-shaped figure formed by the visceral surface of the liver, and the impressions of the liver on other organs. This section also describes in detail the blood supply of the liver. The final section of this presentation contains the histology of the liver. This portion illustrates, through histologic slides, details of the following: hepatic sinusoids' Kupffer cells, the Space of Disse, stained sections of the walls of the central vein, the portal area and the bile canaliculi. In addition, the program illustrates the subdivisions of the liver parenchyma in a pig liver to clearly show each part and its arrangement, including the classical liver lobule, portal lobule and liver acinus. Other histological characteristics shown include the extrahepatic biliary passages and the gallbladder which is opened to expose cells of the mucosa.

Abstract: (Producer) This program, part of a series of three on Gerontology and Human Relations, dramatizes the relationship between an 82 year old woman and an outreach worker. Through the encounter between the social worker and the hostile client, the program emphasizes that knowing herself is a prerequisite for a social worker to establish a meaningful relationship with geriatric clients. Through this relationship the client is ultimately able to regain emotional strength and to acquire a more positive outlook on life.

Abstract: (Producer) This program opens with an interview between a family physician and a patient who presents erectile problems. The patient is referred for more detailed examination by a specialist. The specialist conducts a history and assessment interview, focusing on psychological factors often involved in erectile problems. Detailed physical examination included specialized neurological evaluations. The doctor explains to the patient the value of monitoring penile blood pressure and flow; performs this procedure in the office, discusses specialized endocrine evaluation, draws blood and urine samples; explains the monitoring of sleep erections (nocturnal penial tumescence); and shows this procedure in the sleep laboratory. The physician encourages his patient to ask questions, and maintains a supportive dialogue through the examination. Following the examination, specialist and family doctor meet to discuss diagnosis and plan for treatment.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, the final program in a series on dermatologic signs of systemic disease, presents the specific cutaneous lesions seen in the lymphomas and leukemias. Polymorphous and monomorphous lymphomas, the leukemias, polycythemia vera, and metastatic lesions are discussed and illustrated with clinical photographic material. A review of the microscopic anatomy and behavior of malignant cells in the skin provides a basis for understanding the clinical signs which distinguish these lesions. Details of the physical signs are illustrated to facilitate accurate and specific diagnoses.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents the classical retropelvic dissection, separating the anterior surface of the bladder and urethra from the pelvic periostium. The technique for appropriate placement of the critical sutures or anterior suspension by the para urethral tissue is delineated. The presentation is well done, however, the material presupposes previous knowledge. Thus, the program is recommended with reservations for gynecology students and practitioners.

Abstract: Martha E. Rogers, R.N., M.P.H., Sc.D., R.N., Professor Emeritus, Division of Nursing, New York University is interviewed by Helen M. Ference, R.N., Ph. D., Assistant Professor, Division of Nursing, New York University. Dr. Rogers is one of nursing's leading theorists, having developed the Rogerian nursing science conceptual system, currently being used at New York University and other schools of nursing.
She has authored numerous scholarly papers and several books, the most notable being An Introduction to the Theoretical Basis of Nursing. In her interview, Dr. Rogers discusses her philosophy of nursing, gives her opinions on nursing programs and practices of today and presents her forecast of the future of nursing.
She also recounts various areas of her professional life, some which have been controversial. Dr. Rogers' innovative thinking and high level of professional dedication have made her one of nursing's truly outstanding leader.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, one in a series on restraint and handling, is a diagnostic and economic overview of mastitis. Diagnostics of bovine mastitis are begun with milk collection techniques in the barn, and followed into the laboratory for culturing techniques and evaluation of derviced bacterial colonies. These are interpreted by assessment of infection level in a herd and the directly related economic importance of the mastitis.

Abstract: (Producer) This program overviews the problem, the implications, and presents recommendations for prevention of toxoplasmosis. Toxoplasmosis may cause congenital birth defects and chorioretinitis in man. The coccidia-like protozoa Toxoplasma gondii infests man and animals. Fecal oocysts from Felidae may have considerable epidemiologic and public health importance. Veterinarians are obligated to inform and advise their clients and the public of the importance and potential risks of toxoplasmosis, and to make recommendations that will minimize those risks. 04NLM: WF 140 SC no.9 1969
Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the pathogenesis of morphological and functional mechanisms of respiratory disease. Airway obstructions, neoplasms, coughing, and edema of the respiratory membrane are among the subjects discussed. The program is concise, clear, and displays a smooth continuum, but the slides do not adequately support the narration. The material is too superficial and some information is inappropriate and outdated. This program is recommended with reservations for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program describes and illustrates the cerebral and spinal meninges; the epidural, subdural, and subarachnoid spaces (including the subarachnoid cisterns); the choroid plexus; and the arachnoid granulations. The performance objectives and descriptive text are appropriate. Unfortunately, slide number 6 does not illustrate the epidural space which is emphasized in the narration. In slide number 7, the color scheme for the pia mater and arachnoid should be more contrasting. Too much emphasis is given to the venous plexuses and the sinuses as sites of CSF absorption.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an overview of meningitis. The anatomy, pathophysiology, etiology, and clinical features are reviewed. Signs and symptoms are illustrated and the procedure for a lumbar puncture is demonstrated in a patient simulation. The population at risk is discussed, but is not represented by this patient. The explanations and diagrams are clear and thorough. Knowledge of neuroanatomy, the clinical neurological exam, and a broad definition of meningitis are needed; some supplementary reading is necessary for full comprehension of this disease process. This well organized program is recommended as supplementary material for nursing and medical students.

04NLM: WL 310 SC no.1 1972
Abstract: This program discusses and illustrates primarily with the aid of drawings the anatomical features of the mesencephalon or the midbrain. Initially, the boundaries of the midbrain are identified as follows: the caudal boundary is considered to be a plane which passes through the exiting cranial nerve 4 and the superior pontine sulcus. The rostral boundary is a plane which passes through the posterior commissure on the dorsal surface just caudal to the mammillary bodies on the ventral surface. Priminent external features on both the dorsal and the ventral surface of the midbrain are then described. The following structures are identified: posterior commissure, superior pontine sulcus, superior and inferior colliculi, brachium of superior colliculus, brachium of inferior colliculus, basis pedunculi, interpeduncular fossa, cranial nerve 3, and cranial nerve 4. The internal anatomy of the midbrain is discussed as it is commonly represented by two levels. The first level is a transverse section through the inferior colliculi and the second level is a transverse section through the superior colliculi. The following structures are then identified: lateral lemniscus, medial lemniscus, brachium of inferior colliculus, spinothalamic tract, nucleus and root fibers of cranial nerve 4, medial longitudinal fasciculus, superior cerebellar peduncles, decussation of superior cerebellar peduncles, nucleus of the inferior colliculus, cerebral aqueduct, substantiae nigra, nucleus of superior colliculus, nucleus and root fibers of cranial nerve 3, and the red nucleus.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of an accredited series on introductory principles of nutrition, is an overview of metabolism. The pathways for degrading of fuel nutrients until they are incorporated into the high-energy molecule ATP are traced. The regulatory role of vitamin and mineral coenzymes and cofactors along these pathways are specified. The synthesis of protein at the ribosomes and the role of amino acids and energy in this anabolic process are explained. This material is suitable for college classes, adult education, continuing education for health professionals, and teacher training.

1. Pons - anatomy & histology - slides I. Dunkerley, Gary B. II. University of Missouri--Columbia. Medical Center. Educational Resources Group. III. Series
04NLM: WL 320 SC no.1 1972
Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and demonstrate the internal and external structure of the metencephalon. This objective is achieved with the aid of diagrams and drawings. Performance objectives are also identified. According to this presentation the metencephalon is comprised of two structures - the cerebellum and the pons. The cerebellum is not discussed in this program but is considered in a separate program. The boundaries of the pons are identified and illustrated. These boundaries include the striae medullares, inferior pontine sulcus, fourth cranial nerve and superior pontine sulcus. The fourth ventricle is then described in considerable detail and the position of the cerebellar peduncles is described and demonstrated. The facial colliculus, locus ceruleus and cranial nerves associated with the pons are then described and demonstrated. The program then focuses on the internal structures located within the pons. These are described and demonstrated according to the structural levels. These levels include the caudal portion of the pons, the area of attachment of the trigeminal nerve to the pons, and the area of the emergence of the fourth cranial nerve.

Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates various methods of artificial ventilation. Proper positioning is not always displayed and, although S tubes are demonstrated, precautions and weaknesses are not mentioned. No suggestions for dealing with dentures are presented. Although the use of less pressure is advocated for small children, it does not explain how this can be accomplished. The content is poorly organized, not all educational objectives are met, the sequencing of audio tape and filmstrip is confusing. The program is recommended for limited use only.

Abstract: (Critical) This program uses photomicrographs, illustrations, and a handout to provide a useful description of both rare and common structures in the urine sediment. Abnormalities in urinalysis that should be familiar to all practicing physicians, such as hematuria, acid and alkaline crystals, squamous epithelial cells, white blood cells, yeast cells, and casts are clearly illustrated. The information is accurate and reflects generally accepted concepts about the ingredients in urine sediments and their formation. Descriptions are brief, concise, and appropriate and are technical enough to be of use to the practicing internist and the nephrologist, as well as lab technicians. Minor technical faults include the failure of the signal for slide advancement to sound reliably. This program is recommended for use.

Abstract: This program illustrates, through animation, the ameboid migration of the early sex cells of a three-week human embryo from the caudal yolk sac and hindgut to the area of the urogenital ridge. Pictures of an embryo with seventeen mesodermal somites are shown for orientation purposes. Diagrams illustrating the internal structures of the embryo at this developmental stage are used to identify the earliest known location of sex cells. The second portion of the program concentrates on showing the migration of the primordial sex cells from the caudal end of the yolk sac and the endoderm of the gut towards the urogenital ridges. The dorsal and cranial migratory patterns of these sex cells are illustrated by animated diagrams at different developmental stages of the fetus: 26 somites, 32 somites, and 42 somites. According to the program colonization of these cells at the genital ridge of the future gonad occurs when the embryo is about 8 mm. in length.

Abstract: (Critical) This program depicts three vignettes to stimulate discussion on the management of violent patients. Countertransference and responses to patients are discussed. Flashbacks, symbolism, and alternation of black and white with color photography are used to portray negative examples of interaction between a therapist, a volunteer counselor, and a potentially violent client. Previous knowledge of psychosis, character disorders, mental status examinations, and commitment procedures are assumed. The objectives are clearly stated and a guide to proper utilization of the program for discussion purposes is provided. This program is of excellent technical and educational quality. It should not, however, be viewed by students without appropriate guidance and supervision. It is highly recommended for psychiatric, medical, and nursing students, for social workers and psychologists.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a hospital trustees series, discusses the responsibility for quality of patient care. The legal accountability of each trustee for the actions of the medical staff and the care they deliver to their patients is emphasized. The direct relationship between comprehensive/integrated quality assurance system and liability control is methodically reviewed, along with the legal ramification of 'management by crisis' vs. management by quality assurance.'

04NLM: WG 262 SL no.1 1978
Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the pathologic findings in non-rheumatic causes of mitral regurgitation and correlates radiologic, echocardiographic and electrocardiographic aspects. The Marfan mitral valve, floppy valve, chordal rupture, valve perforation and destruction from infectious endocarditis, infarction of the papillary muscle with rupture or dysfunction and mitral regurgitation secondary to left ventricular dilation are discussed. Although the information is accurate and consistent, some relevant material is omitted. Etiology, historical features, physical examination findings, and hemodynamic abnormalities are not discussed, and two-dimensional echocardiographs are not incorporated. The production is logical and appropriately sequenced, and its implied objectives are achieved. However, some content may be outdated imminently. The visualizations, both drawings and photographs, are of outstanding quality. The program is recommended with some reservations for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This, part of a series on the fundamentals of microbiology, is a review of carbohydrate energy metabolism. The major pathways by which microorganisms ferment glucose and the divergence of fermentation patterns of various organisms are illustrated. The relative efficiency of the basics mechansims is compared. The material is too short, shallow, and sketchy. Expanded coverage to include the uptake and storage of sugars, the regulation sugar catabolism, and polyscride syntheses. Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a series on the fundamentals of microbiology, presents a comparison of the major structural features of prokaryotic and eurokaryotic cells. Basic features of microbial cell structure are discussed and the morphology of cell components is emphasized over the structure of the cell itself. Appropriate chemical detail of wall structure is presented, but, because the variety of cell shapes is essential to classification of bacterial, the program is incomplete. The figures are of good quality, although more detail would be useful. The narration is not sufficiently informative, and the speaker seems bored. Terminology is used without definition. The material is relatively superficial. It is recommended with reservations for use.

04NLM: WC 536 VC no.3 1976
Abstract: (Critical) This program provides introductory information on the typical histologic characteristics of acute viral hepatitis. No electron microscopic, histochemical or immunohistochemical evidence is included. Although differential diagnosis is stressed, there is no comparative material from other forms of acute liver disease. The program's objectives are clearly defined. The material is well paced and clearly illustrated. One disturbing feature is the use of imprecise and confusing terminology. The principal limitation of the program is the question of need. The material presented is too specialized for the medical student and too rudimentary for the practicing pathologist. It is most appropriate for beginning pathology residents, but equivalent or superior material is available from standard textbooks or one good slide and a competent pathologist. Despite thses factors, the program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This module is an introduction to the small intestine as a mucosal digestive surface as well as an absorptive interface. General principles of physiologic, digestive, and absorptive processes are detailed. Sucrase-isomaltase exemplifies intestinal glycoprotein syntheses and processing. Mechanisms of transport, including passive diffusion, facilitative diffusion, and active transport are defined. Starch and disaccharide digestion, monosaccharide absorption, dietary fiber, and enzymatic action are discussed. The effects of injury, surgery, prolonged fasting, and intestinal resection are illustrated, and examples of isolated protein absorptive defects are presented. D-The uses and limitations of the d-xylos test are detailed. This program is intended for teaching aspects of physiology, biochemistry, nutrition, and pathophysiology.

Abstract: (Critical) This program illustrates the location and function of the muscles of facial expression and mastication. The characteristics of facial expression are reviewed and an elementary summary of the attachments and action is provided. The assistance of an instructor is needed to clarify the osteology fundamental to understanding the muscle attachments. The technical quality is clear, but errors in pronunciation and in fact are noted. No educational objectives are specified and this consistently superficial approach to the subject provides instructional aid to an area in which it is not usually required. This program is recommended for extremely limited use only.

Abstract: This program discusses and illustrates, primarily with the aid of drawings, the anatomical features of the myelencephalon. According to the program, this organ is also called the medulla, medulla oblongata, or the bulb. The boundaries of the organ are identified as follows: the caudal boundary of the medulla is represented by a transverse plane just rostral to the highest rootlets of the first cervical spinal nerve and passes through the pyramidal decussation on the ventral surface. The rostral boundary is represented by a transverse plane that passes through the strial medullares on the dorsal surface and the inferior pontine sulcus on the ventral surface. The external features and the five eminences, namely, the pyramid, olive, tuberculum cinereum, cuneate tubercle, and the gracilis tubercle are identified. The internal gross anatomy of the medulla is depicted by transverse sections at three levels. The first level is a transverse section caudal to the olive passing dorsally through the gracilis and cuneate tubercles, and ventrally through the pyramidal decussation. The second level is a transverse section through the caudal half of the olive. The third level is a transverse section which passes through the striae medullares and the rostral half of the olive. The structures which comprise each level are identified.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to discuss myology, the study of muscles, with emphasis on the general features of skeletal muscles which are under voluntary control. The program presents a slide and a tape which discusses and describes diagrammatically this major aspect of the subject. The program begins with a discussion of movement, the major property of muscle cells. Then the properties of smooth, cardiac, and skeletal muscle cells are described. Next the program describes the fibers of the skeletal muscles and the muscle attachments. In addition, the program provides a list of muscle actions and describes each action separately, i.e., prime mover, antagonist, fixator, synergist. Next the program describes briefly the nomenclature used to describe muscles. The program states that the future study of a specific muscle should take into consideration its attachments, form, and action. These points are then discussed as they relate to the temporalis muscle.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a series of forensic medicine programs, is an introduction to intravenous narcotism. The addict population, types of drugs, pathophysiology of drugs, and pathology found in addicts who dies from their drugs by acute intoxication are discussed. Illustrative examples of death scene investigations, physical findings in the addict, and the gross appearance of organs from addicts are provided. A number of addicts showing heavily scarred veins, subcutaneous lesions, tattoos, and paraphernalia of drug injection are presented. Only a background in anatomic pathology is necessary to comprehend this information. The topic is treated very professionally, and the dead are treated with respect. This program is recommended for use.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate primarily by means of a prosected cadaver the anatomy of the nasal cavity. The anatomical structures in the nasal cavity, which opens on the face through the pear-shaped anterior nasal aperture and the posterior openings, the choanae, are identified and described. The program demonstrates many of the structures on a sagittal section of the skull. These structures include the nasal bone, superior, middle, and inferior meatuses of the nose, sphenoidal sinus, infundibulum nasal lacrimal ducts, diatus semilunaris, and uncinate process.

Abstract: This presentation describes and demonstrates the anatomy of the neck on a prosected male cadaver. The superficial structures had previously been identified and the sternocleidomastoid had been separated from its sternal and clavicular attachments.

In this presentation the internal jugular vein, hypoglossal nerve and ansa cervicalis are identified first. The nerves, arteries and veins in this area are identified and their courses followed. The course of the thoracic duct is also demonstrated and the formation of the brachial plexus is discussed. The cadaver is then placed in the prone position to identify the structures of the back of the neck. The trapezius is incised in the midline and reflected and the splenius capitis is dissected from its origin to examine the ligamentum nuchae. The semispinalis capitis is detached from the occipital bone and the nerves innervating these muscles are demonstrated. The suboccipital triangle is described and its contents examined. The course of the vertebral artery is demonstrated. The cadaver is replaced in the supine position and the anterior neck is dissected to demonstrate the thyroid gland. An incision is then made through the isthmus to locate the parathyroid glands.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents a teaching/play session with a group of young schoolagers. It is designed to help them understand the reasons for injections and to abate some of their related fears. The play is structured and well supervised. The interaction between the children is appropriately presented and the play therapist shows a proper approach and good sensitivity to the various children's needs. The program provides good guidelines for how to plan this type of teaching session. It might increase the comfort and skill of a health professional teaching children about injections. The principles could be applied to a variety of other teaching situations with children. The program is somewhat unique in its approach. The material is somewhat controversial since many feel this is not child's play, but this is explained during the presentation. The program is recommended.

Abstract: (Producer) This program examines the general areas of the brain assessed during a mental status examination. At-rest and interactive functioning of these areas is compared during the process of the examination. Graphics identify the twelve paired cranial nerves subsequently tested in sequence. The sensory system is evaluated by symmetrically assessing pain sensation. Where it is abnormal, response to temperature is tested. Beginning with the limbs and trunk, the testing proceeds to the distal and proximal areas, then to the evaluation of sensations originating in the deeper tissues of the body and finally the procedure for assessing discriminative associations is shown.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate techniques used in the neurological examination of the newborn. This objective is achieved by presenting an actual examination and findings of a one month old baby conducted by Paul G. Moe, M.D. The basic components of this demonstration include the examination of the skin, head, extremities, eyes, hearing, tongue, tendons, cutaneous reflexes, infantile reflexes, motor function and sensory responses. During the course of the examination, the physician emphasizes the necessity of proper placement of the infant for each test to obtain correct information. Normal and abnormal reactions to these tests are described during the examination. The final part of the examination, which is not demonstrated, but described, is the transillumination of the skull. The examination methods demonstrated in this videocassette primarily involve the techniques of visualization and do not employ complicated equipment.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a visual guide to physical examination, begins with a reminder that motor activity requires the interaction of the upper motor neurons, the lower motor neurons, and the cerebellum. Assessment of motor activity begins with screening maneuvers and procedes to cerebellar function, muscle strength, coordination, and reflexes.

Series: A Visual guide to physical examination (J.B. Lippincott : 1978)
04NLM: WS 141 VC no.7.5 1978
Abstract: (Critical) A demonstration of the neurologic examination of four children of different ages, all of whom display normal neuromotor behavior and responses, is presented in this program. Procedures commonly employed in a routine physical exam are compared with the more sophisticated techniques used for pediatric neurological exam including testing for mental status and speech, muscle coordination, and cranial nerve, reflex and sensory functions. The clinical implications of normal and abnormal findings are not sufficiently discussed, nor are concerns about development and unusual behavior which may aid in detecting developmental delay or emotional disturbance. Pathological responses, as compared to normal, also require further discussion. The examiner exhibits appropriately sensitive behavior toward the children and their parents. A useful teaching supplement for pediatric residents and continuing medical education, this program is recommended for use.

04NLM: WS 340 SC no.2 1972
Abstract: This program outlines a method of evaluating a neurologically suspect infant. Initially, the clinical appearance of an infant who is neurologically suspect is described. The sequence of steps to follow in evaluating such an infant is outlined as follows: take a family history, maternal history which includes the prepartum, intrapartum, and postpartum period, and observations regarding the newborn period. Specific points covered include high risk mothers, metabolic causes of the infant's problems, the effect on the infant of drug abuse, eclampsia, and hemolytic anemia or rubella in the mother, causes of injury to the infant such as metabolic disturbance, hypoxia, infection and hemorrhage, and the pathological and clinical features of the neurologically suspect infant. Emphasis is placed on the importance of the history in this evaluation. Two cases are then presented and the step-by-step evaluation of each is discussed. In the first, the infant appears neurologically depressed as a result of a central nervous system injury which is most likely hypoxia. In the second, the infant is agitated as a result of neonatal drug withdrawal. In this case both parents used heroin. The mother had also taken LSD.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to discuss and to demonstrate primarily by means of diagrams the basic concepts in neurology, the study of the nervous system. The program includes the following: the neuron, types of neurons; reflex arc; anatomical and functional divisions of the nervous system; cell bodies, processes, somatic components; spinal nerves; mixed spinal nerves; peripheral nerves, arrangement and distribution of the sympathetic and parasympathetic divisions of the autonomic nervous system. The program concludes with a brief review.

04NLM: WV 200 VC no.2 1971
Abstract: Dr. Alford discusses with the aid of slides, principles of use in evaluating patients with neuro-otologic problems. The program focuses primarily on five types of these problems, namely, acoustic neuroma, meningioma of the temporal bone, herpes zoster otitis, viral neuritis of the auditory nerves and glomus jugulare tumors. The classic neuro-otologic symptoms such as hearing loss, tinnitus and vertigo are discussed. Since these symptoms can appear slowly over a long period of time, the importance of using audiologic studies, evaluations of vestibular functions and radiologic and other laboratory studies in establishing an early diagnosis is stressed. In this program the basic examination consists of three aspects: otolaryngic, neurologic and general. The results of the SISI, ABLB, Bekesy, audiogram, COT, SIS, PI function for PB word tests and the central test battery consisting of PI function for PB words, SSI with ipsilateral CM, SSI with contralateral CM are explained in relation to their diagnostic significance as are the significance of electronystagmographic abnormalities of a nonspecific, peripheral, or central nature. The clinical, otologic, audiologic, electronystagmographic and radiologic findings of patients with each of the five types of problems mentioned above are described in detail.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate the use of group physical therapy in Parkinsonism. This type of physical therapy stresses the reestablishment of normal patterns. The group approach is utilized because it seems to encourage independency and social interaction and makes more effective use of the therapist's time. The patients with Parkinsonism are seated in a semicircle on backless benches. The physical activities selected for the patients are designed to help them compensate for the problems that the tremor rigidity and akinesia associated with Parkinsonism brings. The following activities are demonstrated: alternate hand to thigh movements; clapping in front, back, and side; clapping of specified body parts with alternating reciprocal movements; simple finger flexions and extentions; foot stomping; alternating extention and withdrawal of the foot; exercises for the spine; tossing movements; gait training; high step marching; kick ball.

04NLM: WS 105.5.F2 VC no.1 1978
Abstract: (Critical) This program, part of a newborn series, reviews the physician's role in interaction between the newborn and parents. The importance of a systematic approach, a calm manner, and use of the infant's name are emphasized. The discussion includes feeding, cleanliness, signs of illness, health promotion, safety, and other common questions asked by parents. The demonstration would be more effective if the father were included. Controversial areas are acknowledged, but the anecdotal information is superfluous. Educational directives are clearly outlined and reinforced. The technical quality is excellent and the module is effectively organized. The program is recommended for medical and nursing students.

Abstract: (Producer) This program discusses use of the nightguard and demonstrates two methods of constructing the appliance. The habit of bruxism is identified and the consequences of unconsciously clenching or grinding the teeth are described. Placement of the nightguard between the upper and lower teeth in order to disrupt the neuro-muscular reflex leading to bruxism and its undesirable consequences is demonstrated. The program is intended for use as part of a course on occlusion, and, in conjunction with its study guide, for use a supplemental study or for review purposes.

Abstract: (Producer) This videotape is designed for use by medical students, medical and mental health professionals, and lay individuals within the foster care system. This program presents a 'staged' contested dependency review hearing to determine the appropriate custody of a child. After viewing this program, the learner should be able to identify individuals involved in a dependency hearing and to deduce what it is like to participate in such a hearing; for example he/she should be able to identify some of the pressures on the expert witness, the foster parent, and the guardian ad litem. The learner should also recognize some aspects of courtroom protocol, such as the respect given to the judge, the order in which witnesses are presented and questioned; the swearing-in procedure, and the decorum necessary on the witness stand. A written guide is provided to aid the discussion leader in using the videotape with various student groups.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents the anatomy of the nose in two parts. Part I discusses the bony boundaries of the nose including the noses interior and openings. Part II discusses paranasal sinuses and bone and the openings between the nose and other cavities. Skeletal features, innervation and blood supply are also considered. The presentation contains some deficiences including poor quality x-rays and a lack of clinical anatomy. Thus, this presentation is recommended for use only for beginning anatomy students.

Abstract: (Producer) Part of a series on nuclear cardiology, this program examines multiple-gated imaging and cardiac pool anatomy, and relates them to single-pass angiocardiographic techniques. Ejection fraction analysis, and volume curve analysis, two measures of ventricular function that present nuclear angiocardiography from a physiologic perspective, are highlighted. The program concludes with a detailed discussion differentiating coronary and cardiomyopathic heart disease from valvular and congenital heart disease and aortic aneurysm through nuclear angiocardiographic techniques. This discussion is tailored to the primary care physician.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a series on nuclear cardiology, presents the use of thallium stress myocardial imaging in the diagnosis of regional ischemia and technetium and pyrophosphate in acute myocardial infarction. The continuum from indications and contraindications to interpretations is explored in depth. Radioisotope imaging is then placed in perspective with other sources of diagnostic information, such as clinical, electrocardiographic and enzymatic tests, as part of the total regimen available for clinical diagnosis. The presentation is well conceived and developed the information is clear, concises, and valuable. However, a number of hypotheses, methods, and interpretations are presented with entirely the opinion of the author and which are sometimes contrary to generally accepted practice. The technical quality of a number of figures is quite poor so the images are difficult to visualize. The program is recommended with reservations for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This program illustrates the development of pulmonary edema resulting in acute respiratory distress after a young patient's heroin overdose. As indicated by the interpretation of the assessment findings, the patient's condition necessitates reposition of the endotracheal tube, precautions in the use of the ventilator, consideration of alternative approaches to oxygenation (PEEP and CPAP), establishment of guidelines for continuous reevaluation, and plans for extubation. These intervention measures are discussed and/or demonstrated.

Abstract: (Critical) This program portrays a clinical case study to illustrate assessment, nursing intervention, and evaluation of a patient with acute chronic obstructive pulmonary disease. The correlation of laboratory and clinical findings is featured, including blood gas measurement, radiologic examination, clinical symptoms, respiratory pattern, auscultation, and spirometer reading. Oxygen administration and chest physiotherapy are reviewed. Elements of the nursing process are detailed in a panel discussion among nurses. The technical quality and the instructional design are good. This program is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an overview of the nursing process. Assessment or data collection, planning, implementation, and evaluation are explained. The need for using behavioral objectives are identified and how-to examples are provided. A precise format for writing nursing orders is presented. The teaching plan to accomplish long term goals for the patient, the checklist used as a guide, and the specification of knowledge, skills, and support systems to be identified are excellent. Although some of the material is incomplete, inadequate, and, occasionally, unrealistic, the instructional formation is effective overall. It is recommended for use.

04NLM: WB 400 VC no.1 1973
Abstract: The purpose of this program is to discuss the nutritional requirements in the injured and postoperative patient. The program achieves its objective primarily by means of diagrams and drawings. The program identifies two major metabolic requirements for the injured patient, namely energy production for the survival of essential organs and for repair of injured tissue. The program then discusses the percentages of carbohydrates, fats and protein in the human body and each component's potential as a source of energy. A comparison is made between the nutrition of the starved individual and the postoperative patient, in reference to each persons protein catabolism, nitrogen loss and specific requirements for glucose as an energy source. The program notes that although similarities exist, the surgical patient loses more protein as a result of an increased need for glucose in wound repair. The program stresses that protein loss cannot be alleviated by calories alone, but requires some form of parenteral therapy. The therapeutic methods to promote protein synthesis, which are described in this presentation, are elemental diet and intravenous alimentation.

Abstract: (Producer) This two-part program provides an update for physicians on the application of total parenteral nutrition. Part One summarizes assessment data regarding nosocomial malnutrition compiled by a community hospital medical team and reviews the procedures followed to implement a total nutrition support service. Part Two focuses on techniques of nutritional assessment-- doing a physical examination and taking a routine dietary history, conducting anthropometric and laboratory tests to project nutritional compromise, and making decisions for an appropriate intervention.

Abstract: (Producer) This program looks at occupational stress and the potentially related health problems which accompany chronic high levels of stress. The specific issues examined include a short discussion of the physiology of the stress reaction in humans, work environment stressors, potential health effects, and suggestions for the physician/medical expert as to the potential treatment and intervention modalities available to minimize stress. The last half of the program presents two mini-documentations examining two high-stress jobs as case studies: police dispatchers and municipal bus drivers in a large metropolitan area. The program would be a useful tool for discussion regarding occupational stress in a medical or nursing course offering in occupational health.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an overview of physical, psychologic, and vocational aspects of cancer. Complications of cancer and its treatment are discussed. Disfigurement from surgery, radiation, and chemotherapy are considered, and side effects on memory, coordination, and mood are discussed. Specific problems of different types of cancers are not presented. The technical quality is not very good; the narration is amateurish, more illustration is needed; and the material could be more logically arranged. Although the objectives and purpose should be clarified, this program is recommended for use.

04NLM: WP 250 VC no.1 1969
Abstract: The purpose of this program is to describe and discuss the surgical correction for vaginal agenesis by the construction of an artificial vagina utilizing the embryological development of the vagina as a basis for the operative approach. The normal and abnormal embryological development of the vagina is first discussed and demonstrated utilizing diagrams and animation. The surgical correction is then demonstrated on a 16 year-old clinical patient. In this program, a Reese dermatome is used to take bilateral skin grafts from the posterior aspects of the thighs; these grafts will line the new vaginal canal. A racquet shaped incision is made around the vaginal pouch with the handle extending posteriorly over the fourchette. The mucosal area is dissected toward the midline leaving the deeper tissue attached in the midline. Using Hagar dilators, each of these two areas is stretched up to the width of a no. 25 Hagar dilator and to a depth of ten centimeters. The septum is then transected. A stent composed of foam rubber and covered with a condom and one of the skin grafts is inserted and sutured in place. After ten days, the stent is surgically removed and replaced with a second stent. With this method the graft is held in uniform apposition to the new vaginal wall at all times for a period of 4 weeks. A fusiform hollow plastic mold is then substituted for the stent and is worn at night for a period of six months.

Abstract: (Critical) This program provides step-by-step instruction in the basic set-up, priming, and operation of the Haemonetics Model 30 Blood Processor. Because there have been modifications to this blood cell separator, the information should be revised and updated accordingly. Technical components of this module are clear, concise, and well correlated. The material is strictly procedural and should be used only in support of other instruction. Potential problem areas are not addressed. No references are listed to document or support the information presented. This program is recommended as supplemental instruction on the mechanics of the Haemonetics Model 30 for hemopheresis nurses and technicians.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is a presentation of the operation and functions of laminar flow safety cabinets. Other efforts to control microbial aerosols for protection are classified and described. The purpose, function, mechanics, and filtering process of the laminar flow systems are reviewed. Operator techniques for both normal and emergency situations, such as planning, start up, loading, precautions, and safety procedures, are examined in a step-by-step format. The beginner may require supplementary information, but experienced laboratory personnel would benefit from this concise and accurate review. The program is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program illustrates various pathological conditions involving the oral and perioral areas. Identification is provided on a key accompanying the slides. Previous knowledge of the entities is needed to facilitate identifying the pathology. The visual quality is variable, but by and large, it is of good quality. To serve as an instructional program for a naive audience, more didactic information is necessary. The program is recommended with reservations as a review of dermatologists, dentists, and oral surgeons.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is a historical review of early ear surgery. Otologic surgeons who were instrumental in this development process are interviewed regarding their own contributions and their associations with former progenitors of ear surgery. A 1958 film of stapes mobilization techniques is highlighted. Although the production has little practical application, this medical history is informative and the program is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for nursing students, for nurses in refresher programs and for nurses in clinical practice who are updating their knowledge of emergency burn nursing. This program identifies the nurse's role in the care of the patient with a minor burn injury. The program begins with a discussion of the causes of minor burn injuries and a definition of a minor burn wound. Aspects in the treatment of a minor burn injury are then explained. These include: promotion of patient comfort, wound care, infection control, patient teaching and follow-up care.

Abstract: This presentation identifies and describes the management of various types of ovarian enlargements with the aid of drawings and diagrams. In this presentation the ovarian enlargements are categorized as neoplastic and non-neoplastic. Various other findings within the abdomen which may lead to an error in diagnosis are described first. The program then discusses non-neoplastic enlargements of the ovaries and describes the etiology, pathology and treatment. The non-neoplastic enlargements considered are follicle cysts, corpus luteum cysts, theca-lutein cysts, endometrioma, sclerocystic cyst of Stein-Leventhal syndrome., dermoid cysts, serous cysts, and mucinous cystadenoma. Varieties of solid neoplasms which are discussed in a similar manner include metastatic tumors from the gut, breast and uterus, and malignant teratoma, endocrine active tumors such as the granulosa cell tumors and thecoma, Brenner cell tumor, fibromas, and dysgerminoma. The management of the ovarian enlargements is then reviewed and stresses the importance of the age of the patient in considering treatment. Types of surgery are described briefly. The staging of ovarian cancer as outlined by the International Federation of Gynecology is briefly noted.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a newborn series, is an overview of oxygen equipment for the newborn. Types, function, and application are reviewed. Oxygen delivery, monitoring, and analysis are covered. Matching conditions with equipment is emphasized. The rationale for oxygen therapy is good, but the informal, casual presentation and slang terminology are distracting. The equipment is not always that which is in standard use and current American Academy of Pediatrics' recommendations regarding oxygen therapy are not mentioned. The material is generally accurate and commonly accepted, this program is recommended for use with reservations.

Abstract: This program discusses and illustrates, primarily with drawings, the embryology, gross anatomy, and histology of the pancreas. The embryology of the pancreas is discussed first. The development of the pancreatic buds, ducts, and the secretory acini and islets is traced. The gross anatomy of the pancreas is then described. The parts of the pancreas and its peritoneal relationships are identified. A transverse section of the abdomen is shown to illustrate the relationship of the pancreas to other organs. The arterial supply to the pancreas is then discussed in considerable detail. The histology of the pancreas is then discussed and illustrated with the aid of photomicrographs. The histologic features of the secretion granules, cellular regions of the ductal system, centroacinar or centroductal cells, interlobular duct, islets of Langerhans and alpha, beta and delta cells are described.

Pathophysiology of diarrhea [Motion picture] : an approach to therapy/ Eaton [Laboratories]. -- Norwich, N. Y. : Eaton : [for loan by Norwich-Eaton Pharmaceuticals, Film Library], 1973. 1 reel, 17 min. : sd., col. ; 16 mm. Eaton medical science teaching series. Audience level: --Medical: undergraduate; general and specialty graduate. --Nursing: undergraduate; specialty graduate. --Specialty: gastroenterology. Rating: Recommended. Review date: July 1974. 1. Diarrhea - physiopathology - motion pictures I. Binder, Henry Joseph, 1936- II. Eaton Laboratories.

04NLM: WI 407 VC no.1 1973

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to describe a new pathophysiological concept of diarrhea and how this concept changes the therapeutic approach used. This concept is that intestinal electrolyte secretion may be the common denominator in many diarrheal syndromes. The program's objective is achieved with the use of diagrams, animation and drawings. The three diseases presented in depth to support this concept are celiac sprue, cholera and lactase deficiency. The program stresses that the therapy involved in each condition is dependent upon the mechanism responsible for the disease. In this program, celiac sprue is first described as a disease of unknown etiology which causes a jejunal mucosal abnormality, varying degrees of malabsorption, evidence of vitamin deficiency, a defect in the sodium absorption and which shows no response to glucose. The diagnosis is made by a biopsy of the small intestine and the therapy is a gluten free diet. Cholera, a disease of underdeveloped countries, is of inerest within our medical communities because it is a prototype diarrheal disease and can be produced experimentally. The disease is caused by an enterotoxin produced by the Vibrio Cholera which causes severe profuse watery diarrhea, low in protein and high in potassium and bicarbonate content while absorption remains normal. The diarrhea does not respond to glucose but it is self-limiting and if adequate fluid replacement is maintained, survival is assured. In lactase deficiency, the intestinal electrolyte secretion and diarrhea occur only when lactose is present. This lactose intolerance may be due either to inflammation or to an isolated enzyme deficit. Withdrawing the offending disaccharide, lactose, from the diet usually controls the disease.

04NLM: WM 30 FC no.1 1973

Abstract: This filmstrip series in three parts is intended to present mental health concepts and their implications for nursing care situations. Part I deals with concepts of psychological growth and development based on Erickson's eight stages with demonstrations of psychological needs of patients; Part II concentrates on examples of coping patterns including defense mechanisms and patterns of adjustment by which patients reduce anxiety caused by their illness; Part III explains the role of the nurse in community mental health services. The instructor's guide provides suggestions on how best to utilize the audiovisual material in different learning situations.

Abstract: This program is presented in a lecture format and focuses primarily on the clinical uses of pediatric bronchoesophagology. Slides and motion picture photography taken through the endoscope as well as cinefluoroscopic views are presented to illustrate the clinical uses of this procedure. X-rays of the following are shown and are accompanied by a brief description of the radiographic findings and management of the case: bronchiectasis in a three year old, respiratory infection, asthmatics, atelectasis of the left lung caused by a fibroma of the bronchus, esophageal atresia and fistula, and an esophageal fistula.
Endoscopic views of the following foreign bodies are shown: chicken bone, jacks, nickels, dimes, quarters, wood screw, glass beads, peanuts, eggshell, safety pins and the eye of a shoe. Views of several of the objects being removed under cinefluoroscopy are also provided. Symptomatology, diagnosis and management of foreign bodies in the pediatric patient are also briefly described.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the psychosocial implications for the pediatric patient and family, with major emphasis on the hospitalized child and parents. A broad range of psychosocial topics is covered, such as behavioral responses of children to illness, alleviation of a child's fear and pain, alteration in body image, the dying child and family, and working therapeutically with the parents of ill and hospitalized children. Realistic examples are presented to illustrate practical intervention strategies and concepts and principles applicable to clinical practice. Nationally known pediatric experts share current views on the psychosocial needs of children at different developmental stages. Self-instructional components are effectively integrated, and the technical quality is excellent. This module is highly recommended as an introduction or review to pediatric nurses and other personnel involved in pediatric health care, at all levels of instruction.

Abstract: (Critical) This program, volume 23 of a cardiology slide atlas, discusses the pathological findings of acute and chronic pericarditis, attempting to correlate gross anatomical findings with general non-invasive diagnostic techniques. Excellent implementation of high quality anatomical and x-ray slides contrasts with incomplete electrocardiogram slides. The findings of the jugular pulse tracings, apexcardiogram, and intravascular pressure recordings are not taken into consideration. The material is worthwhile and is recommended for use by senior medical students and beginning residents.

04NLM: W 100 SC no.4 1976
Abstract: This program has two parts - one covering the spinal nerves and one covering the cranial nerves. The anatomy of the spinal nerves deals with their functional components and nuclear connections and pathways within the central nervous system. The autonomic system and cranial nerves I and II are only briefly presented. The title is somewhat misleading, since the program covers the central nervous system connections as well as the anatomy of the spinal and cranial nerves. A major educational deficit is the use of a new clinical terminology for the functional components of peripheral nerves. Although the standard classification system is presented, the emphasis on a non-standard terminology precludes profitable use of this material by a beginning student. Advanced students who are already at home with standard terminology might benefit by this approach to the topic from a different direction. Other faults in the presentation include too much material and labeling on some slides, some difficult to follow leader lines, and a variable (but annoying) mispronunciation of the word 'nucleus' and its derivations. Although performance objectives are provided, post-test material is absent. It would have been preferable if several sections had been used to present the material, instead of only two.

04NLM: WI 575 VC no.1 1970
Abstract: This program details step-by-step the dissection and removal of the intestine. Initially, the viewer is oriented to the peritoneal cavity. On the prosected cadaver used in the program the anterior abdominal wall had been previously removed. A transverse incision is made through the external oblique muscle at thelevel of the iliac spurs. The inferior epigastric muscles are cut and an incision is also made through the transversalis fascia which is then lifted above the underlying peritoneum. The peritoneal cavity is opened by curring through the remaining posterior rectus sheath and parietal peritoneum at the level of the anterior, superior iliac spine. A sagittal incision is made to the midline. The parietal folds produced by the ligaments are then identified and the normal araangement of the viscera is studied. Beginning at the point where the esophagus passes through the diaphragm, each segment of the alimentary canal is identified and its peritoneal relationships are shown. The blood and nerve supply of appropriate organs is discussed. The intestine is removed by placing two ligatures around it and cutting in the appropriate place. The large intesting is removed first. Another incision is made six inches above the ileocecal junction and still another incision is made near the colon. This segment of bowel is then removed in a similar fashion.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a slide atlas of cardiology, is a well-documented overview of the pathology, x-rays, and angiograms of patients with patent ductus arteriosus. The pathology is well-outlined, descriptive; slides are good; and the overall technical quality is excellent. This is an accurate, well-organized correlation of all categories involved in the diagnosis of the common congenital abnormality. This effective educational tool is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program, part of a physician series, is a two part review of the toxicity of several oncological agents. Therapeutic principles, indications, contraindications, and precautions for each agent are detailed. Major and minor toxicities as well as the reversibility of the toxic effect are discussed. Guidelines for initiating and continuing therapy in terms of hematological parameters are included. The information is relevant and appropriate, but it may be considered obsolete. The visualizations are innocuous for the most part; most of the value of the program can be derived from the tape and the text. The material is fairly comprehensive; it is recommended for nurses, physicians, and pharmacists.

04NLM: WS 420 VC no.17 1978
Abstract: (Critical) This module, part of a newborn series, demonstrates the physical examination of a one or two day old infant. The importance of the history, observation, exam sequence, and time limitations are discussed. Each step is explained and normal and abnormal features are characterized. The essential aspects of the physical care are omitted and the instructional objectives are not met. Neither the nursing role nor patient preparation are covered. The technical quality is poor. Although the format and organization are acceptable, an outline and summary would facilitate comprehension. The program is recommended with reservations for nurse practitioners and medical students.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents the physiology of all phases of the sexual response cycle for both male and female. Concentration is on the external genitalia and breasts of the female. Improvement could be made by inclusion of additional visuals, especially of living views of the various aspects of the cycle. There should be greater description of the total body response during orgasm. The inclusion of too much text for each visual causes the viewer to lose his train of thought and concentration. Overall, the program is not well organized and may have only limited usefulness.

Abstract: (Critical) This program discusses the epidemiological trends of the elderly, projecting the future increase in both numbers and percentages. Factors contributing to increased longevity, characteristics of the elderly population, and the variations in aging in different human populations are discussed. The need for incorporating geriatrics into medical education programs is emphasized. Variable effects of aging on body tissues, external changes, musculo-skeletal changes, and changes in the pulmonary system are described. Less visible changes in endocrine, sexual, psychological, and GI functions are not discussed. Objectives are clearly specified, but the information is slighly redundant and repetitive. Some slides may be more detailed than time allows for absorption. This program is a good introduction to the basic epidemiological and pathological issues involved in geriatrics and is highly recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program reviews some common physician mistakes in the emergency room. Specific examples of doctor/patient interactions illustrate the errors. Detailed record keeping and clearly defined chains of authority are advocated, and the coordinating control is deemed the ER physician's responsibility. The information is not specific; key points are not sufficiently emphasized; and not enough case studies of the various errors presented. This brief, but entertaining basic introduction to some medicolegal implications of emergency room medicine is recommended with reservations for medical students, student nurses, or hospital administrators.

Abstract: (Producer) This program examines the fears and anxieties that confront the hospitalized child and demonstrates how a professionally supervised play program can help to provide outlets for the child's feelings. The therapeutic value of play is dramatized by children who play out experiences they have had as patients. The presentation focuses on the use of play activities coupled with support from the hospital staff, to combat the dependence that comes with illness.

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and demonstrate step-by-step a technique of polycentric total knee arthroplasty using a Vitallium thermal condylar component. This objective is achieved with the aid of two clinical subjects, diagrams, cineradiographs, and views of the gross specimen. During surgery, the tourniquet is applied and a long median parapatellar incision is made. The suprapatellar pouch is opened and the joint is exposed. Most of the retromolar fat pad is removed and the meniscus is excised anteriorly on both sides. Synovium is excised from the anterior cruciate ligament and within the supracondylar notch. Osteocytic spurs are also removed. Two femoral slots are made so that the posterior condylar elements will be on a plane 40 degrees perpendicular in the long axis of the femur. The bone between the double cuts for the slots is removed. Drill dummies are inserted in the jig which is held securely in the appropriate position in the slot. Holes are made and a drill is inserted to prevent the jig from slipping. The condylar elements are inserted into the slots and the posterior projections of the femoral condyles are resected. Tibial slots are then cut with the power saw, preserving 8-10 mm. of the posterior tibial wall. The jig is removed and methyl methacrylate is packed into the femoral slots and the component and both femoral condylar components are embedded together. All soft plastic is removed from the posterior aspect of the knee and the area of the capsule. A small notch is made in the subspinous area of the tibia, methyl methacrylate is inserted into the tibial slots, and the tibial tracts are inserted. The patella is replaced, the wound is irrigated with 0.1% neomycin solution, and the knee is closed in the usual manner.

04NLM: WU 515 VC no.20 1978
Abstract: (Producer) When an anterior tooth has lost a large amount of tooth structure, and has had previous endodontic treatment, its restoration with a full-crown requires an internal core which is retained and supported by post-reinforcement. The three films of this series each demonstrate a different method of accomplishing a post-reinforced core for an anterior tooth. Part One shows preparation of the post-channel and the auxiliary pin-channels, and cementation of a stainless-steel post and two cemented-type pins. Part Two demonstrates a direct technique for fabricating a one-piece post reinforced cast-core for an anterior tooth. It shows how a precious-metal post, and two precious-metal pins, are fitted to the prepared post-channel and pin-channels. Part Three shows the various steps involved in making a one-piece post-reinforced cast-core for an anterior tooth by means of an indirect technique. The demonstrated procedures include: preparation of the post-channel within the root-canal, and preparation of two pin-channels within the remaining dentin; fitting a smooth plastic post, and pins to the prepared channels; impression-making, and pouring the cast; fitting a precious-metal post, and pins, to the die; and the use of a resin pattern material to fabricate a pattern indirectly (on the cast).

Abstract: (Producer) Post-reinforcement for a bicuspid tooth can be accomplished in several different ways. This film demonstrates three methods of achieving a post-reinforced amalgam-core for bicuspid teeth: (1) for a bicuspid tooth with two root-canals, two stainless steel posts are used, and - one in each canal; (2) for a bicuspid with only one root-canal, a single post is used within the root canal, and a second post can be placed within the dentin, when adequate bulk exists; (3) as an alternative for a bicuspid with only one root-canal, a single post is used within the root-canal, and two auxiliary pins (either cemented or threaded) are placed within the existing dentin. Amalgam is packed around the posts and/or pins. At a subsequent visit it is prepared for a full-crown foundation.

Abstract: (Producer) Post-reinforcement for a molar tooth can be achieved in several different ways. This film shows two methods of accomplishing a post-reinforced amalgam-core for a molar tooth. For a mandibular molar, a stainless-steel post is cemented into the post-channels which are prepared within each root-canal. These multiple posts are used to support and retain an amalgam-core. For a maxillary molar, this same procedure is augmented by the use of auxiliary pins. Other procedures demonstrated include placement of a copper band matrix with interproximal wedging, packing of amalgam material around the posts and/or pins, and preparation of the amalgam-core at a subsequent visit to provide a full-crown preparation.

Post-reinforcement for repair of fixed prosthesis [videorecording] / produced by Veterans Administration Dental Training Center, in cooperation with Gerard L. 04NLM: WU 500 VC no.29 1978
Abstract: (Producer) If an abutment tooth supporting a fixed prosthesis requires endodontic therapy, and access to the root-canal is made through the abutment crown, the existing restoration may be jeopardized. This film explains the step-by-step procedures employed in making a one-piece post-reinforced cast inlay which fits the lingual opening of the crown and serves as a dowel-like extension to a depth of approximately two-thirds the length of the root. This strengthens the abutment tooth and its crown, and restores the necessary support, resistance, and retention. Repair of an existing fixed restoration by means of post-reinforcement can prevent fracture of the weakened abutment, and avoid displacement of the prosthesis.

Audience level: —•Dental: undergraduate; graduate; continuing education. —Specialty: endodontics, general practice, dental, dentistry, operative, prosthodontics. Review date: Aug. 1981. 04NLM: WU 230 VC no.33 1978
Abstract: (Producer) When an endodontically-treated tooth requires a full-crown restoration, only a minimum amount of coronal tooth structure remains, and any thin sections of the tooth could be easily fractured. This program describes a method of reinforcing such a tooth. It demonstrates how the root-canal is prepared to create a post-channel with parallel sides, and extending one-half to two-thirds the length of the root. It also shows cementation of a cylindrical, stainless-steel, serated, vented post within the prepared post-channel, to reinforce the tooth so it will resist fracture.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents a simple but realistic approach to preparing a school age child who is to undergo surgery. Included are the major concepts which should be shared with a child of this age. The growth and development principles are accurate and appropriately incorporated. The format is quite structured and the child unusually cooperative. The objective is simple and seems to be met. The physical appearance of the nurse does not enhance the educational quality. The material on the ICU seems to be an afterthought and does not contain appropriate material. This subject is important and should be taught in a clinical setting after classroom instruction. This program might have some supplementary value. It is recommended with reservations for undergraduate nurses and possibly for parents and children.

Abstract: (Producer) This program identifies the nurse's role in continuing physical support and preparation for transport of the burn patient. Continuing physical support is discussed in terms of respiratory support, cardiovascular support, gastrointestinal support and other support measures which will assist the patient before transport. Then communications that are important to facilitate the transfer of the patient are presented as well as apects of the emotional support needed by the patient and family. The program emphasizes the responsibilities of the emergency department nurse after fluid resuscitation has been initiated and wound care performed.

Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates the techniques and process of a comprehensive assessment of normal school age children, both male and female. Establishing rapport, respecting the child's need for privacy and modesty, and assuring the child of findings are discussed. The assessment of head, face, eyes, teeth, height, weight, blood pressure and respiration are also shown. The presentation is well done and meets its objectives. Thus, this program is recommended for pediatricians, family practitioners and nurse practitioners.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for all hospital employees and staff and for those students who are preparing to work in a hospital. Principles of fire prevention are explained in this program, beginning with the conditions necessary for a fire to start. Examples of combustible and flammable materials in the hospital, and sources of fire ignition and support are presented. Specific guidelines for fire prevention are then demonstrated in various hospital settings. Fire danger associated with the use of smoking materials, flammable liquids and gases, and electricity are explained. Throughout the program, the importance of applying fire prevention guidelines in every area of the hospital is emphasized. This program is available in a wide range of formats from 35mm filmstrip through videocassette. It also contains preview and review exercises as part of the instructor's guide.

Abstract: (Critical) This program presents the basics of electrocardiographic recording. The usefulness of the ECG, the principles of volume conductor and dipole theory, and the mechanisms of the ECG machine are detailed. Some basic omissions and inappropriate inclusions detract from the educational value of this program. The diagrams are ineffective and the narrator's accent may be distracting to some viewers. The range of topics is too broad; the attempt is made to cover too much material; and the title is misleading. However, the information is generally accurate and the program is recommended with reservations for use.

Abstract: (Producer) This program was designed for all hospital employees and staff and for those students who are preparing to work in a hospital. This program defines priorities for actions during a hospital fire. The importance of using good judgment is emphasized, and factors which influence appropriate actions are explained. Then specific actions, in accordance with the priorities of established fire procedure, are illustrated. Actions taken to protect patients from fire are demonstrated first. Then actions taken to contain the fire, report the fire, and extinguish the fire are shown. The program concludes with a brief review of evacuation procedure. This program is available in a wide range of formats from 35mm filmstrip through videocassette. It also contains preview and review exercises as part of the instructor's guide.

Abstract: (Critical) This program, part of a professional liability series, is a review of procedures for communicating with physicians, staff, and others, in terms of professional medical liability. Degree of responsibility is discussed. The means by which communications processes can assist physicians, staff, and hospitals avoid malpractice litigation is discussed.
The title is misleading in that the program is on professional medical liability, not professional communications generally. The closing comments, which emphasize the primary goal of the physician-patient communication is the informed, confident patient should have been emphasized throughout. The material is well organized and relevant, but the medium is used quite ineffectively. With minor revisions of title and introduction, this program is recommended for use.

Abstract: The purpose of this program is to demonstrate the subtle choices which an interviewer must make during the course of a psychiatric interview session. This is achieved by means of a twenty-eight minute interview session conducted by Dr. James Ryan. At several intervals during the session, Dr. Roger Mackinnon and Dr. Robert Michels, authors of a textbook on the psychiatric interview, stop the videotaped interview and present comments and constructive criticisms of Dr. Ryans technique. The patient shown in this interview is a twenty-six year old man who has been hospitalized for seven months for treatment of alcohol abuse, drug dependency, suicidal tendencies and chronic unemployment. During the interview session he presents a somewhat passive, controlled composure with a noticeable underlying contemptuous attitude towards the interviewer and the session itself. In general, the interview techniques demonstrated by Dr. Ryan involve: selective questioning, open-ended questions, verbalization of the patient's feelings and confrontation at the conclusion of the interview. The observations discussed by the two psychiatrists concerning this interview session include an inappropriate focus on phenomenology, a fixed 'modus operandi' of specific questions, emphasis on external reality, circumvention of the patient's resistence without dealing with its meaning and premature closure of the interview. The two psychiatrists conclude that this interview could have been more productive and that it might have been arranged to benefit the patient in a more specific way, e.g. as a consultation.

04NLM: WM 420 VC no.2 1972
Abstract: This program contains a brief fifteen minute interview with a 25-year-old schizophrenic patient. The purpose of this program si to show 'how to utilize a brief psychiatric interview and how to develop it in a step-by-step fashion' in order to gain the 'most amount of information in the shortest amount of time.' This objective is achieved by means of illustrating the patient at three stages of the interview followed by a brief discussion of the information obtained during each stage. The first stage is designed to elicit signs of the patient's spychopathology including behavior, affect, mental mechanisms and somatic conditions. During this stage the patient demonstrates a depressed mood and a resistant attitude towards the interviewer. The discussion by Dr. Ryan summarizes the behavior observed at this stage, he notes the patient's periods of confusion, blocked thinking and depersonalization.

The second stage deals with the investigation of the causes of the emotional disorder or the psychodynamics of the patient. In this stage, the interviewer questions the patient on his developmental history, his parents' personalities and his home environment. In the discussion of this stage Dr. Ryan summarizes the psychodynamics found in the patient.

The final stage of the brief interview involves confrontation of the patient with his manner during the interview to insure awareness of the patient's feelings and to help resolve the restraint of the patient during the interview. A final review of these three stages in the brief interview is given.

Abstract: (Producer) This three-part program uses case studies to demonstrete the way people handle everyday stress through unconscious psychological defenses. Part One explains the unconscious and illustrates the way defense mechanisms evolve from childhood experiences, with particular emphasis on repression. Part Two focuses on avoidance, denial and undoing, explaining why we unconsciously use these defenses.

Part Three describes the way we use fantasy and regression to reduce tensions, noting that persistent use of these defenses may indicate mental illness. Additionally, the symbolic relationship of dreams to waking experience and the function of dreams in helping to ease anxieties is discussed.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an overview of basic psychopathology. Definitions are presented for abnormal behavior, anxiety disorders, personality disorders, and schizophrenia and causation, intervention, therapies, and case examples are discussed. Diagnosis and rehabilitation are emphasized and the value of DSM III is explained. The written information is clear and well organized, but the material, overall, is very basic, too long, and a bit dull.

Although not appropriate for professionals or graduate students, this production is recommended for audiences at a more elementary level.

Abstract: (Critical) This module, one in a hospital infection control series, discusses the psychosocial effects of sensory deprivation resulting from strict isolation. Causes of sensory deprivation during isolation, and physiological, mental and behavioral changes are briefly, but concisely, discussed. Suggestions for nursing intervention to prevent or reverse sensory changes are explained and visualized.

A common fear of patients of being unclean and unacceptable is not discussed. Some of the information is applicable to a much larger patient group than indicated. The narration lacks animation and polish and the visualization seems superfluous. This program is recommended for hospital workers in general.

Abstract: This is a review of quick and responsible interventions in cases of psychotic, verbally and physically assaultive patients arriving in the emergency room. These reactions are usually precipitated by drug intake or stress in labile patients. Several demonstrations discuss and demonstrate potential encounters and three major management techniques. These techniques are: (1) non-physical, verbal control by establishing rapport, authority and giving choices of behavior; (2) physical restraint and (3) administration of medication with consideration of side-effects. Finally, disposition options are discussed on the basis of various criteria. The accompanying booklet, provides listings of medications, as well as a post test.

The producer will give four hours of continuing medical education credit if the program is completed according to instructions.

Abstract: (Critical) This program review pulmonary function studies in children. The various tests are covered, and their indications, clinical applications, expected test results, and potential problems are discussed. The basic physiology of the lung in relation to spirometry should be included. The topic is presented in a rather superficial manner. Interpretation of the data should be more thoroughly discussed and exemplified. The technical quality is, for the most part, excellent. This material is clear, simple, and to the point; it is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Critical) This program demonstrates the current diagnostic imaging approach to the pulsatile abdominal mass. Imaging modalities, testing, ultrasound examination, advantages and disadvantages, and clinical examples are covered. The function and value of ultrasound as an accurate non-invasive technique are emphasized. However, the program is well balanced by the presentation of arteriography and its advantages in the case of potential surgery. Computed tomography is omitted completely from the discussion. Previous knowledge of the pathology of abdominal aortic aneurysms is assumed. The visual quality is clear and the information is well organized.
Although a somewhat superficial treatment of the material and possibly too elementary for radiologists, this program is recommended for general surgeons, medical practitioners, and nursing personnel.

Abstract: (Producer) This program presents animation of the left and right heart demonstrating pure aortic valve regurgitation of moderate severity, with synchronized sounds and murmurs and simultaneous display of sound notation and pressure curves. Events taking place during a single cardiac cycle are explained, demonstrating in turn the generation of the fourth sound, the mitral component of the first sound, the ejection systolic murmur, the aortic component of the second sound, and the early diastolic murmur. The cycle of the heart is shown repeatedly, first slowed down, then at normal speed. The generation of the mid-diastolic (Austin-Flint) murmur is portrayed.

Abstract: (Producer) This film explains the beneficial advantages of double collimation as a means of reducing the field of radiation. With a smaller-size beam, placement of the film-packet intra-orally is extremely critical. The Versatile Intra-Oral Positioner provides an effective means of correctly placing the radiographic film, and of accurately projecting the x-ray beam of reduced size. Minimizing the amount of radiation protects the patient, the operator, and all office personnel.

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and demonstrate the operative technique of radical mastectomy and the use of post-operative irradiation and oophorectomy. In this presentation two patients are treated with radical mastectomy. The first patient, a 50 year old female, is prepped and draped. A needle biopsy is done and the frozen section is reported as positive. An Aguino incision is made, the axillary dissection is done, and the breast is removed. The wound is irrigated and the skin is closed with interrupted sutures. A pressure dressing is held in place with a binder. In the second patient a Halstead incision is made and the contents of the axilla in all its various planes are swept downward towards the breast which is then removed. A T-tube is placed in the axilla and a skin graft is taken from the abdomen to cover the devect in the breast. A small pack is sutured over the graft and the incision is closed with interrupted sutures. This patient is shown at various healing stages. According to this presentation the treatment to follow depends upon the pathologist's findings in the lymph nodes. Statistics are cited regarding the 5 - 10 year survival rate after large field radiation. If there are no axillary nodes, nothing further is done. If there are positive nodes in the axilla, or the lesion is subarealor or medial, large field irradiation followed by oophorectomy is considered to be the treatment of choice.

Abstract: This presentation demonstrates a technique for radical pneumonectomy in the treatment of extensive neoplasms confined to the hemithorax. The program notes that no significant increase in mortality has resulted from this procedure and that it should be performed whenever a pneumonectomy is indicated. The step-by-step surgical procedures for right and left radical pneumonectomy are demonstrated on two clinical patients. The first case involves an undifferentiated carcinoma originating in the right lower lobe with mediastinal metastases. An intrapericardial approach is used in the operation. The right pulmonary artery and vein are isolated, divided and sutured. Wide removal of the mediastinal lymphatics is then performed through incisions on the mediastinal pleura. The carina and about two inches of the left main branchus are mobilized and resected and the bronchial suture line is then covered with with a free graft of pericardium. A final suture is placed at the divided end of the pericardium and epicardium to prevent herniation of the heart into the right hemithorax. The second case is a patient with a carcinoma arising from the left upper lobe invading the left main bronchus. Here, the mediastinal pleura is opened at the vagus nerve, which is later divided, and all the lymph nodes along its recurrent nerves are removed. The left superior and inferior pulmonary veins and pulmonary arteries are isolated, divided and suture ligated. The mediastinum is widely dissected. The right main bronchus is mobilized for about two inches and then divided distally. The bronchial suture line is covered by a free graft from the pericardium as in the first case and the wound is closed.

Abstract: (Critical) This program is an overview of the radiographic examination of the upper gastrointestinal tract of the dog and cat. Various types of barium and iodine preparations are reviewed, including their indications and counterindications. Normal radiographic anatomy is described and upper GI motility is demonstrated. The material is clear, well organized, and effectively illustrated. It is highly recommended for veterinary students and as continuing education for the practicing veterinarian.

Abstract: (Critical) This program describes the state of the art in gallbladder imaging. The constant flux inherent to this field is clearly depicted in the presentation of recently developed techniques and the contrast between newer and standard modalities. Controversial approaches are debated, with the author's bias revealed. No mention is of real-time cholectystosonography. Case studies are presented and images of biliary pathology evalutions are illustrated. Agents, equipment and techniques are reviewed. The educational objectives and design are worthwhile. A broad knowledge of pathology is assumed. The material is well organized but the visual quality is variable. The program is recommended for use.

Abstract: (Producer) Part of a series concerning victims of violence, this program discusses the theoretical aspects of rape as part of an effort to prepare the nurse to work effectively with victims of rape and sexual assault. Emphasis is placed on nursing intervention in primary care facilities (i.e. emergency departments, out-patient clinics, and doctor's offices). The presentation attempts to dispel myths and help nurses to cope with values relative to the rape victim.

04NLM: WE 835 MP16 no.1 1970

Abstract: The purpose of this presentation is to describe and demonstrate the reconstruction of the thumb on a two-and-one-half year old male child with multiple congenital defects, including atresia of the thumb. The program objective is achieved with the use of x-rays in addition to the step-by-step performance of the surgical procedure. The presentation notes that previous experience has shown that it is not worthwhile to try and save a digit without normal architecture and without normal independent control. In this presentation the surgical procedure is divided into two stages. The first or destructive stage involves the conversion of the vestigial digit into a flap and the partial amputation of the index finger. The second or constructive stage involves the transplantation of the index finger into a passageway created for it by splitting the greater multangular bone, inserting the soft cancellous bone of the head of the metacarpal into this crevice and then transplanting the skin flap from the vestigial digit as an island pedicle into the web space between the pollicized index finger and the long finger which will be the new index finger. In the conventional procedure, the index finger is pollicized on its own metacarpal base which is one of the reasons why the digit looks too long. In this particular case, the child had already pollicized his index finger. The film notes that it is preferable to perform this surgery at an early age to take advantage of the relative laxity of the small joints in the child's hand and of the baby fat which allows for more redundant skin.

Reeter, Alan K. ICU electrical safety [slide] / written by Alan K. Reeter and Bruce R. Herrick ; produced by Biomedical Communications, University of Arizona, Health Sciences Center. — Tucson, Ariz. : The Center, c1978. 50 slides : col. + 1 sound cassette (21 min. : 1 7/8 ips) + 1 guide. Funded in part by Square D Co. of Oshkosh, Wisconsin. Sound accompaniment compatible for manual and automatic operation. Includes post-test. Audience level: —Allied health: non-degree/technical; graduate; continuing education. —*Nursing: non-degree/technical; graduate; continuing education. —Specialty: operating room nursing, surgical nursing, patient care team, operating room technicians, critical care. Review date: Mar. 1982. Learning method: Self instructional.

Abstract: (Producer) This slide/cassette program presents the important precautions all members of the patient care team must observe when caring for electrically sensitive patients (eg patients with external pacemakers). Rather than just presenting a list of do's and don'ts, it gives a clear description of how electrical systems work, using a cardiovascular system analogy.
This theoretical background provides the basis for understanding the special electrical systems found in an ICU and why special precautions are necessary in caring for some patients. Topics covered include microshock, grounding and equi-potential grounding systems. The well-executed cartoon style makes for a less threatening presentation that helps maintain viewer interest and facilitates understanding. The Instructional Guide provides a content summary and a post-test duplication master.

Abstract: (Producer) This module, part of a series on optics of the human eye, illustrates the refraction of light in its simplest form, and the nature of light and the principles and mathematical formulas of its refraction by different media. Snell's law, vergence and divergency of light rays, dioptric values, nodal points, and stigmatic imagery are covered. Manipulation and control of light rays by simple prisms and combination of prisms to produce image-forming lenses are demonstrated. This material is directed to the beginning student of optics.

The Refractory cast in removable partial denture construction [videorecording] / produced by Veterans Administration Dental Training Center, in cooperation with Robin E. Abstract: (Producer) The various steps involved in modifying the master cast, surveying, block out, and its duplication, are demonstrated in step-by-step fashion. The film includes the transferring of the design, use of depth gauges as well as the placement of reliefs. Waxing procedures incident to developing the wax pattern for a maxillary removable partial denture with a design which includes circumferential clasps and a palatal strap major connector are illustrated. Preparation of the cast, use of pre-formed elements and free hand waxing are described.

04NLM: WJ 303 SC no.3 1976
Abstract: (Critical) This program gives a well planned presentation on the distribution of potassium in the body, the factors that influence renal potassium excretion, the renal mechanisms contributing to potassium excretion, the nephron sites primarily involved in potassium excretion and the regulatory mechanisms. It includes recent data on how potassium handling by the nephron is affected by changes in potassium intake. The program is a primary teaching device for professional students in a comprehensive physiology course. With a few exceptions, it is quite good. Certain sections are too condensed and, due to the complexity of the subject, the student will have to repeat these several times or carefully read the accompanying workbook to obtain an understanding.
The program is best used as an adjunct to lectures and/or text reading. Effective use of the material will require several sessions of exposure; however, due to the complete and unique nature of the presentation, it should be well worth the effort.
